FORT WAYNE, IN JULY 1999

To
Martin A. Ryerson
President of the Board of Trustees
this book is Respectfully Dedicated.

Greetings

In Cap and Gown again we stand
And welcome all with outstretched hand,
Our greetings here we now extend
And to the world we would commend
Our brief account of college-land.

In vain would words of ours expand
The joys of life at our command,
For here our joys and trials blend
In Cap and Gown.

In truth, your humble scribes have planned
To answer future years' demand
And make this book a worthy friend
When college days are at an end;
And even then make life seem grand
In Cap and Gown.

A Glance Backward

BEING A CHRONICLE OF THE PROGRESS OF THE UNIVERSITY FOR THE PAST TWO YEARS

THE University has at last reached that degree of vine-clad dignity where it has a Past. From that time all glory dates; in that atmosphere traditions flourish. Already members of the Class of '96, the first regularly graduated class, are returning to regale the students of the present with tales of "the old days" and wonder if the fun now can compare with the larks of '94 or the wild freedom of '93 before the Midway was cleared away. They stroll about the campus in quest of old-time haunts only to start and stare at a massive pile of austere gray suddenly looming up before them. Occasional visitors go into ecstasies over our "stupendous piles" and tell you what an education they would have had if they could have read Homer in red-roofed buildings. Then they tell you how much of the University could be seen (or, rather, was not to be seen) from the Ferris wheel. The nightwatchman will tell you over his midnight pipe how his boy used to shoot ducks where the gymnasium now stands. Why the boy's sport should have been spoiled for the sake of the present building is a mystery known doubtless only to the President and to the Senior Class.

Notwithstanding this example of apparent retrogression, the growth of the University in the past two years has been phenomenal. The four Biological buildings in Hull Court, with their well-equipped departments; the Yerkes Observatory at Williams Bay, Wisconsin; the elaboration of the system of affiliated institutions; the widening of the scope of the University Extension, and the international expeditions in which the University is a coöperator, mark a development unequalled by any other institution of learning in the world.

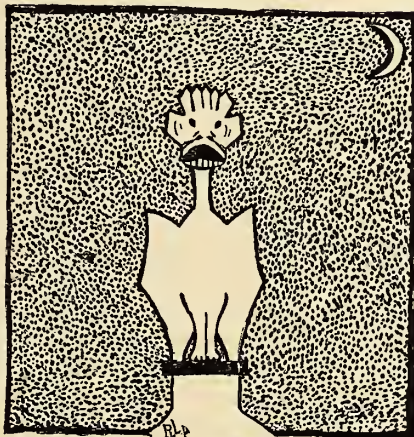

December 14, 1895, Miss Helen Culver of Chicago presented to the University property valued at $1,000,000, "the whole gift to be devoted to the increase and spread of knowledge within the field of the biological sciences." A part of this large contribution was intended to further endow the biological departments, a part for the erection of buildings, a part for sustaining an inland experimental station and a marine laboratory, and a part for sustaining on the West side of Chicago, University Extension lectures on biology, particularly on the advances of science in sanitation and hygiene. This contribution is a memorial of Charles J. Hull, who was a trustee of the old University of Chicago. The corner-stones of the buildings were laid July 3, 1896, during the Quinquennial celebration. Work was pushed rapidly throughout the following year, and they were formally opened at the ceremonies of the Nineteenth Convocation, July 1, 1897. The zoölogical, botanical, anatomical and physiological departments now have equipments that place the University in the foremost rank of institutions for the study of the biological sciences. The other provisions of the gift are being carried out as rapidly as opportunities permit. The Hull Gate, and also the buildings, were designed and planned by Mr. Henry Ives Cobb.

The Yerkes Observatory is a work of which the University is justly proud. With the largest and most powerful telescope in the world and unparalleled means for using it to the greatest advantage, we may, with all modesty, expect to make the most valuable contributions to learning in the field of astronomy for many years to come. The Observatory was founded in 1892, through the munificence of Mr. Charles T. Yerkes, of Chicago. In that year Mr. Alvan G. Clark undertook the construction of an object-glass of 40 inches aperture, for the principal telescope of the Observatory, and Messrs. Warner & Swasey were given a contract for the equatorial mounting. The latter was completed in the following year and exhibited by its makers at the Columbian Exposition. An important feature, employed for the first time in this telescope, is a system of electric motors by means of which the various motions are effected. The object-glass has been tested by Professor James E. Keeler, who acted at the request of the Director as the "expert agent" called for by the contract. The definition was found to be fully equal to that of the Lick telescope, while the light gathering power is considerably greater. The formal dedication and opening took place July 2, 1897.

The University Press has achieved a national and international reputation for the journals and books which it has published during the past two years. Each department of the University has a periodical in which appears the latest contributions to its own special field of knowledge. In addition, books published under the direction of the departments and from the pens of professors pursuing individual research, have attracted the close attention of the scientific and literary world.

Plans for a large building adequate to the demands of the Press are complete, and work has already been commenced. The building will be located on the corner of Ellis Avenue and Fifty-eighth Street. It will contain the offices, composing rooms, presses and mailing department. The latest machinery for making a great publishing house will be put in, and the scope of the department widened.

The University might well be content to be known only through its Extension Department, which has brought its many advantages for culture and instruction to people who are prevented by circumstances from living on the campus or within daily reach of the quadrangle. During the year 1896-97 the department maintained 95 active Extension centers, with 141 courses in progress. Eight states were represented. The total attendance at the Extension lectures was 29,344, and at the Extension classes 17,382. Twenty-nine lecturers were engaged for the work of the year. In addition to the regular work the department has organized a system of traveling libraries that the student may obtain the necessary reference and text-books recommended in the various courses.

Beyond our national boundaries the University has made a most creditable showing. Polar and Oriental expeditions of discovery and research have all had representatives, while our professors in the astronomical, geological and biological departments have been leaders and organizers of parties for furthering investigation in their respective realms. The Barrows Lectures, endowed by Mrs. Caroline E. Haskell, were delivered in India by John Henry Barrows, D.D., Professorial Lecturer for the University.

Probably more exemplary of our astonishing growth than any other feature is the increase of the number of books in the libraries. For the two years ending with April 1, 1898, the additions have amounted to more than 25,000 books.

By no means a minor feature is the organized system of affiliated institutions which coöperate with the University. The most important one affiliated during the period covered by this chronicle is the Bradley Polytechnic Institute at Peoria, Ill. This institution had the advantage of starting under the general supervision of the University. The opening of the school occurred October 8, 1897.

As far as building is concerned the campus is changing as rapidly as the most fin-de-siecle co-ed could desire. The gods from the faculty room on Mount Olympus continue to decorate this little domain in large patches of cold gray and fiery red till the effect is most striking and bewildering. But where, oh where, is the landscape gardener to add a softening, inviting touch to the scene? This criticism is, we believe, common only among the men—the women care not a whit for the landscape so long as the trees in front of Kelly are strong enough to support a hammock and old enough to maintain a discreet silence.

College spirit, about which so much has been said and written since the first student registered at Cobb Hall, is steadily growing. For a long time keen observers thought they saw manifested among the students that insidious germ which for want of a better term we call Harvard indifference. A second glance, however, proved the trouble to be not indifference, but the lack of a past. The undergraduate spirit is keeping pace with the march of tradition. A few attempts have been made to manufacture the latter precious article, but though partial success has attended these efforts, it cannot compare with the natural growth, evidence of which we begin to discern here and there. The youth of the institution must always be borne in mind. Six years may seem a long time to the student who has droned through his Greek and Mathematics, but it is a short time for such an eternal creature as a tradition. Wrinkles are not natural to the babe's brow. If we see them there the child looks worn, pinched and ugly. Why, on our walls the vines have reached only the first-story windows. The students here now who are trying to put the Glee Club, the Cap and Gown, and the Oratorical association on a paying and successful basis; who are trying to rouse more enthusiastic support for the athletic teams; who are trying to start literary magazines, daily papers and other enterprises—these students are pioneers. Wait till the ivy has reached the second story casements. Let tradition go its own natural pace and college spirit will take care of itself.

The Quadrangle Club is instituted for the association of members of the faculties of the University of Chicago and other persons interested in literature, science or art. It has one hundred and ninety resident and forty non-resident members.

The club-house, Lexington Avenue and Fifty-eighth Street, which was partially damaged by fire twice during the early part of the year, was burned on the morning of December 25, 1897. The original structure has been restored and an annex added on the east side. To the north two hundred feet of adjoining property have been purchased. During the season of '97-'98 the following entertainments were given by the club:

SMOKE TALKS: Mr. Charles L. Hutchinson, Mr. D. G. Elliott, Mr. Ned Arden Flood, Mr. John Henry Barrows, Mr. Frederick Starr, Mr. F. B. Tarbell, Mr. William Kent, The Glee and Mandolin Clubs.

RECEPTIONS: Ladies' afternoon receptions, January 13, February 10, March 10, April 14, May 12, June 9, November 3; Ladies' evening receptions, July 14, September 9; Settlement benefit reception, March 6; Chamber concert receptions, June 5, October 15, November 12, December 9, January 7 (in President's house), February 11 (in Kelly Hall); reception to Mr. Marion Crawford, November 15; to Mr. Anthony Hope Hawkins, December 1; to the Faculties of Rush Medical College and other affiliated institutions, February 4 (in Haskell Oriental Museum).

GENERAL ENTERTAINMENTS: Exhibition of Fancy Shooting, April 30; Poster Exhibit, May 5-8; Chamber Concerts: June 5, the Spiering Quartette and Mr. George Ellsworth Holmes; October 15, the Spiering Quartette and Mr. George Hamlin; November 12, the Spiering Quartette, Mr. Hans Bruening and Mrs. Dudley Tyng; December 9, the Spiering Quartette, Mr. W. H. Sherwood and Mrs. Minnie Fish-Griffin; January 7, the Spiering Quartette and Mrs. Ella Dahl; February 11, the Spiering Quartette and Mr. Walter Ames. Informal ladies' evenings: Thursdays during the Summer and Mondays from October to December.

The Hopper of Death

A student knocked at the fiery gate, and the devil stuck out his head:

"Now is it well you should come to hell when you ought to be in bed?"

"O Devil," the student he answered up, "I have not come to stay,

But I must pass in Prof. Vincent's class, and this is the only way;

I'm sent to investigate hell," he said, "and bring back a full report."

The devil grinned as he snapped the pin; "Come in," he said with a snort.

"Remember, though, if you pass this door you'll hardly get back outside:

The air is bad for a growling lad," and he flung the portal wide.

The student laughed as he stepped within and politely removed his hat:

"I worked three years in our gym," he said, "and what's hell after that?"

HE Mulberry Club is a group of verse-makers, nearly all of whom are students in the University of Chicago. When of a Saturday morning the spirit moves thereto, those that will, repair to the south side of the Pine-tree Isthmus, an idyllic spot in Arcady, which borders on Bohemia, but is farthest from Philistia. Here no emporium chimney can be seen—the pines take care of that—the water is blue to north and south, the forest is thick to east and west. The rules of the club are few but inexorable :

- I. The club shall meet not regularly, but occasionally.
- II. Each member shall read to the others his latest verses, and read them twice without reprieve.
- III. The Sacrosanctum Ypocras Theologicum Mori shall be quaffed.

FOOT BALL

IN FOOT-BALL Chicago has by continuous good work deservedly earned her place in the foremost rank. Our team has gained the honor of being able to look forward to having their opponents in every game playing with the stimulus and desperation which the deciding game of their season alone can give. To account for this success in so young an institution as the University we call attention to the fact that we are supported by the two things which young colleges are supposed to lack: members from which to draw material for a team and spirit to back it. Especially we are fortunate in having a system to our coaching, as opposed to the method employed in other western colleges, by which players are compelled to unlearn each year what was knocked into them the year before. For the same reason our future in foot-ball is assured, as the alumni coaches under Mr. Stagg are slowly recruited from the victorious teams of the present. The records of the two seasons, 1896 and 1897, though marred by two defeats in 1896 and one in 1897, is one of which we may be proud. During the two years we were victors in more hard fought games with those teams struggling for the Western Championship than any other college, and while we cannot claim the championship for ourselves we deny the claim of any other team to it or to an equal record of victories.

AS yet track work has not gained the enthusiastic support which greets other forms of athletics. This is the case throughout all the West, and in spite of the fact that our western records are undeniably good, even at the Western Intercollegiate meets the crowds are small considering the number which a contest between almost any two of the colleges in base-ball or foot-ball would draw. It is not to be wondered at that spectators fail to appreciate the wearisome succession of heats and the poorly managed and long drawn out field events. The same fault which permits the field events to lag until nightfall and spectators to enter the field is responsible for the lack of well sustained rivalry throughout all the program. Another reason is in the newness of the recognition of track work as a first class intercollegiate sport. Dual meets offer more excitement, as the rivalry is more focused, but even here the contests are too new to attract the attention they deserve. Our own meets gain more and more attention on the campus, and there is no reason why, with the increased spirit, and with the meets well advertised, we should not be both victorious and successful financially.

Chicago's Track Record for 1896

On February 29 the University in dual meet defeated Lake Forest at the Gymnasium. Jackson, of Lake Forest, tied the world's record in the 35 yard dash, at .04½. The points: University of Chicago, 56; Lake Forest University, 33.

The University gave its first annual invitation meet at the First Regiment Armory, March 14. Chicago won easily, with 20 points to the First Regiment's 10.

April 18, occurred the First Cup Meet, remarkable for the first appearance of Peabody in bicycle contests. With a handicap of 50 yards he defeated Bachellé, scratch, in the mile event. On May 4 he again defeated Bachellé, both starting from scratch, and ten days later repeated the victory. Attention was immediately centered on this wonderful young rider who had appeared so unexpectedly. His rise in amateur cycling was rapid. During the remainder of the year in college and without, he added victory after victory to his record. In 1897, however, his first year out of college, his achievements on the wheel became phenomenal. He steadily refused to become a professional, though several times he showed himself equal to the cleverest riders of that rank. At the close of the season his victories outnumbered Zimmerman's amateur record. Nothing can speak better for Chicago's athletics than Peabody's championship of the cause of amateur cycling.

The Triangular Meet, held in Marshall Field, May 30, 1896, resulted in a victory for Chicago. The summary:

CHICAGO'S TRACK RECORD FOR 1897

The indoor work or the track team would have been uneventful, there being no important meets, but for the controversy between Mr. Stagg and the Amateur Athletic Union. In order to spur the members of the track team to greater efforts and to give them some experience in actual contests. Mr. Stagg arranged a dual meet with the First Regiment, to be held March 12, 1897. However, about a week before the appointed date, Mr. Stagg received a letter from Mr. R. E. Fishburn, President of the Central Division of the A. A. U., informing him that all participants in the meet must register with the A. A. U., under penalty of disqualification. Mr. Stagg determined to test the matter and to fight the question out with the A. A. U. He accordingly announced in the papers of the city that he would hold an open meet and invited all who wished to contest. The meet was held and Mr. Fishburn published a statement that all who have taken part in it were disqualified and debarred from all further contests held under the rules of the A. A. U. But Mr. Stagg received no official notice of his wholesale disqualification. The Universities of Minnesota and Illinois publicly upheld Mr. Stagg in the stand he had taken, while the University of Wisconsin and Northwestern University supported the A. A. U. The Manager of the Northwestern base-ball team, in obsequious haste to do the bidding of the A. A. U., called on Mr. Stagg and declared that Mr. Stagg must submit to the A. A. U. and register his men or Northwestern would refuse to meet the University of Chicago on the diamond. Mr. Stagg replied that, so far as he himself was concerned, the A. A. U. had nothing to do with the case; he had taken his stand and would not recede from it. The justification of Mr. Stagg came shortly after when the A. A. U. admitted its defeat by receding from its position and removing its ban from our track team.

In the Dual Meet with the University of Illinois, at Champaign, May 11, Chicago was easily victorious, with 77 points to her opponent's 43. The summary :

Michigan won a total of ninety-four points, with twelve firsts, nine seconds, and seven thirds; Chicago a total of forty-six, with four firsts, six seconds, and eight thirds.

The Western Intercollegiate Meet was held at the Bankers' Athletic Club's Field, June 5. Four western records were broken, Maybury lowering the time in the 100 and 220 yard dashes; Richards in the 120 yard hurdles, and Bunnell of Minnesota in the Mile Walk. Burroughs pushed Maybury hard, his wonderful form for his Sophomore year promising greater things for the season of '98. The summary:

BASE BALL

THE BASE-BALL season of 1896 left us, after a season extending from March 31 to July 2, during which thirty-three games were played, with an undisputed title to the western championship. Sixteen western college games were played, in which we made 127 runs to our opponents' 80. In the series with Michigan, Chicago won three out of five. All the other games we won. A well contested game was played with the Chicago League team, and we had the pleasure of seeing Capt. Anson struck out by Henry Clark.

Indeed the season's work was so gratifying that an eastern trip was taken. Enthusiasm in the University stimulated by this innovation ran high, and we waited breathlessly for those telegrams signed A. A. Stagg. Excitement had reached its height when the crowd gathered around the bulletin board on the afternoon of May 27. And then as we gradually realized that it wasn't a practical joke, we went home. However, the team was as successful as we could expect, considering the extremely hard trip. Of the four college games played we won from Cornell and Pennsylvania, and lost to Yale and Harvard. As an appendix to the eastern trip came the series with Brown on our own grounds. The games were all that could be asked for, the crowds big, the weather lovely, while the spectators were held breathless, and victory was undecided until the last put-out. It is greatly to be hoped that Mr. Stagg can close negotiations with Brown or some other eastern college, as a climax for the season of '98.

The eighteen ninety-seven season was much shorter, lasting only about two months. Fourteen college games were played, of which we lost three. As for the championship, Illinois and Chicago won from each by the same score, but the records of the two teams point very much in our favor. All other championship contestants were defeated, although we lost to Beloit by a score of 11 to 12.

ALTHOUGH tennis as an intercollegiate sport has not the prominence of track, base-ball, or foot-ball, yet our representatives have gained international renown. We have reason to be proud not only of having always held the Western Intercollegiate Championship, but also in having our representatives in the past two years win the Western Women's Championship, the Western Championship in singles, and the national championship in doubles. With the uniformly victorious team, with Mr. Neel, Mr. Bond, and Miss Pound to speak for our interest in tennis and its result, we look for continuous success in tennis.

Chicago's Tennis Record for 1897

The first series in the Annual Dual Tournament with Northwestern University was held on Chicago's courts, May 22. The University was victorious in both the singles and the doubles. In the former Bond, Blackwelder, Poulson and Gottlieb won four of the six matches; in the latter Bond and Rand and Blackwelder and Gottlieb won two of the three. The summary:

SINGLES

Bond, (C.) defeated Johnston, (N.) 6-2; 6-1
Blackwelder, (C.) defeated McGrew, (N.) 6-4; 7-5
McCaskey, (N.) defeated Rand, (C.) 6-2; 2-6; 6-4
Poulson, (C.) defeated Gates, (N.) 6-4; 6-1

McCaskey and Ward, (N.) defeated Poulson and Gould, (C.) 4-6; 6-4; 6-4
Blackwelder and Gottlieb, (C.) defeated Gates and Orchard, (N.) 7-5; 6-4

On May 28 at Ann Arbor was held the Annual Dual Tournament with the University of Michigan. The matches were hard fought on both sides. Chicago lost ground in the singles but carried off all the honors in the doubles, bringing the tournament to a close with a tied score. The summary:

SINGLES

Bond, (C.) defeated Herrick, (M.) 2-6; 6-4; 6-1
Danforth, (M.) defeated Blackwelder, (C.) 6-4; 6-3
Russel, (M.) defeated Halsey, (C.) 4-6; 7-5; 7-5
Lamb, (M.) defeated Gottlieb, (C.) 4-6; 8-6; 7-5

DOUBLES

Bond and Anderson, (C.) defeated Danforth and Lamb, (M.) 6-4; 6-2
Blackwelder and Gottlieb, (C.) defeated Harvey and Herrick, (M.) 6-4; 5-7; 6-2

The second series in the Dual Tournament with Northwestern was played at Evanston, June 7, and resulted in an overwhelming victory for Chicago. Northwestern won only one of the seven matches in the singles, and one of the three in the doubles. The summary:

SINGLES

Bond, (C.) defeated Johnston, (N.) 4-6; 6-4; 6-2
 Halsey, (C.) defeated Orchard, (N.) 6-3; 6-4
 Rand, (C.) defeated McGrew, (N.) 6-0; 6-0
 Gottlieb, (C.) defeated Ward, (N.) 6-3; 6-1
 Blackwelder, (C.) defeated Orchard, (N.) 6-4; 6-1
 Brewer, (N.) defeated Anderson, (C.) 6-4; 6-3
 Poulson, (C.) defeated Barnard, (N.) 6-2; 6-0

DOUBLES

Bond and Rand, (C.) defeated Ward and Orchard, (N.) 4-6; 6-3; 6-1
 Orchard and Johnston, (N.) defeated Blackwelder and Gottlieb, (C.) 2-6; 6-1; 6-0
 Poulson and Anderson, (C.) defeated Barnard and McGrew, (N.) 6-1; 6-0

The Western Intercollegiate Tournament was held on the courts of the Quadrangle Club, June 3-5. The Colleges represented were: Albion, Knox, Northwestern, Wisconsin, Michigan and Chicago. The matches were exciting and hard fought, though it was foreseen that the final struggle would pit Michigan against Chicago. Bond, however, had little trouble in carrying off the championship in singles in three straight sets. Bond and Rand also won the championship in doubles. The summary:

Reverie

And the measureless, far-away look in her eyes—	Is it for riches and ribbons and sweets;
Can the gods tell the reason for this, I pray? 	For books and ethereal realms of the wise,
Is it for coiffures, or hats, or gowns * 	Or is there a man in the landscape swept
Some other girl wears in a reckless way?	By the measureless, far-away look in her eyes?

Some people are born women ; some acquire women, and some have women thrust upon them.

In bygone days when heroes bold
Sat making merry 'round the fire,
A harper sang of deeds of war
And as he sang, he played the lyre.

But now long past are those old days;
The minstrels fast are waxing fat;
And though our Harper no more sings,
Yet still he plays—the diplomat.

As It Was Seen

Telegraphed on the Spot by the Cap and Gown's Dramatic Critic

The annual performance of the Dramatic Club took place at Rosalie Hall, December 18, 1897. A triple bill was given, consisting of a curtain-raiser "Courtship with Variations," "Barbara" by Jerome K. Jerome, and "Cupid's Touchdown," a local play, the work of James Weber Linn, '96. The curtain-raiser made no pretensions as to plot, but the incidents were original and the dialogue interesting. Miss Cooke's work was marked with its usual finish and pleasing individuality. As the charming widow, Virginia Berkely, she won the honors of the evening. Mr. Coulter's work in this play was good, but his characterization lacked dash.

Jerome's "Barbara," although it ought to have been shelved decades ago, was very well given by Miss Rider, Miss Knight, Mr. Hagey and Mr. Gould. As "Barbara," Miss Rider entered into the spirit of the part thoroughly and did some extremely strong acting. This is the first time that Miss Rider has been given a part worthy of her efforts and she showed herself deserving of still better things. Mr. Hagey, the embarrassed lover, acted with an unmistakable and almost suspicious realism. Jerome's impulsive, light-hearted Dorothy and impulsive, light-hearted Miss Knight made a happy combination and added a much needed bit of vivacity to the dialogue. Mr. Gould's excellent make-up was, perhaps, the best part of his accurate presentation of Finnicum, the typical stage "legal-adviser."

"Cupid's Touchdown," a skit based upon two popular themes—love and football, was, without doubt, the hit of the evening. It was thoroughly up-to-date in that its action was rapid, its dialogue bright and its plot nearly, if not quite, impossible. Miss Keen, with both dash and delicacy, gave a very acceptable presentation of collegiate Miss Evans. Mr. Nott Flint, as Arthur Howland, "the best 'tickle' the team ever had," managed to say the most impossible things in a most plausible manner and also looked the part to perfection. Miss Knight made Miss Magruder a distinct contrast to Miss Evans, and in so doing filled all the requirement of the part. Mr. Eckhart, otherwise known as G. Howe Faste, brought down the house in more ways than one. Not only was each violent entrance greeted with a round of applause but it was only the valiant efforts of the stage manager that saved the scenery from a general collapse after his last headlong exit. Miss Allin, the maid "who was incidental," was "incidental" in the extreme, but by virtue of her regulation Kelly Maid's costume added a bit of local color to the production.

Mr. Gould, disguised as a dude, did his duty manfully and his insipid, drawling Frankleigh Dulle, side by side with the bustling clubman, G. Howe Faste, served as a tribute to Mr. Linn's excellent handicraft. In short the warm reception given this play proved conclusively that a good local production is not only not an impossibility but an accomplished fact.

The Stage

The Cap and Gown desires to call attention to the unprecedented excellence and variety of the theatrical attractions offered on and about the campus during the season of '97 and '98. Among those on the boards at present are:

Mr. Walter Schmahl in "Romeo and Juliet.

NOTE.—The management announces that a different actress each week will be cast for the role of Juliet.

Robert B. Davidson in "The Little Minister."

Thomas B. Blackburn in "The Girl I Left Behind Me."

Charles L. Burroughs in "The Fast Mail."

Mr. Percy B. Eckhart in "His Foster-Sister."

Mr. John Coulter in "Never Again."

Heard on the Campus

The man sat on the sofa, talking of the weather,
The co-ed close beside him—they oft sat thus together.
The maid was in the parlor turning out the light;
The man, the girl, the darkness—oh, lordy, what a sight !

If it is fiction, we call it Romance ; but if it is fact, we pronounce it Scandal.

The man who most enjoys the play called Life, is he who can sit comfortably in his seat and watch himself act his part in the drama.

Whatever creeds there may be rest upon the stars. Therefore it is easy to shift about beneath them.

Flattery is like a dinner of empty paté shells to a hungry man.

A man never makes so great a hit as when he strikes the bottom of his grave.

Epigrams are axiom like utterances, which the maker knows to be untrue.

There are more beautiful women in one volume of poems, than there are in all the world.

Fortune is but a fickle coquette, whose smiles are not lavished without reward.

“ Where are you going, my pretty co-ed ? ”
“ I’m going to gym, sir, now,” she said.
“ And may I go with you, my pretty co-ed ? ”
“ As far as the door,” she archly said.

Profanity is foolish, sinful and satisfying.

Hunger for knowledge like physical appetite is frequently sated with poor food.

’Tis better to have loafed and flunked than never to have loafed at all.

Why do you begin the word Faculty with a capital letter ?
All words referring to Omniscience begin with capitals.

Prexy be nimble, Prexy be quick.
Hunt up some more millionaires you can stick.

Sing a song of six pence, and half a dozen flunks,
Forty-’leven notices—a quarter full of flunks.
When the door was opened, “ Young man,” exclaimed the Dean,
“ It’s plain to see you’ve spent your spring a gamboling on the green ! ”

A Girl of Lazistan

WAS only a girl of Lazistan;
In his veins the blood of the Sun-God ran.
He plucked me out from the soil of the street,
He called me the rose of his garden retreat.
I was his fountain that laughed in the sun,
His star that glittered when day was done.
I was the jewel that lay on his heart,
Mine was the shrine where he worshipped apart.
And I was a girl of Lazistan;
In his veins the blood of the Sun-God ran.
He loved me, he kissed me, he lay on my breast,
And I was the bulbul that sang him to rest.
Into his arms I would melt for repose,
And he would enfold me as leaves do the rose.
I was only a girl of Lazistan;
In his veins the blood of the Sun-God ran.

* * * *

They came in the midst of the dark fragrant night,
And the almond-tree blooms fluttered down in affright,
Of a sudden they swooped, like sorrow they came,
And they blasted the flower of our love as with flame.
Those purple-clad Parsîs with arms waving wide,
"Woe, woe to the follower their law who defied."

For I was a girl of Lazistan;
In his veins the blood of the Sun-God ran.
And now they have come to take me away,
Yet we loved and we kissed but yesterday.
They say the Eternally Pure decree
Doom, for lovers who loved as we.
For him, in the Tower of Silence a bed,
And Parsî prayers at sunrise said.
For me, to be hurled like refuse far
Into the river that runs by Istâhr.
The Eternally Pure have decreed in vain;
We care not, not we, for death and its pain,
For the souls become one, of two lovers slain,—
Even mine, a girl of Lazistan;
And his, whose blood from the Sun-God ran.

Florence Wilkinson.

Cardiac Complications

I closed the folio with a sigh. "Well, I am at your ladyship's service," I said, "any Herculean task that you care to impose."

Betty by this time was hanging out of the window inspecting the night air and, incidentally, corrupting the mature mind of Foster by graphic imitations of Anna Held's carolings.

"Oh, it's not much," she said, drawing her head in again, "just to help me with a little note."

"Which means, I suppose, the solitary and unaided composition of the same and its meek submission to the editorial rulings of the severest and most refined of critics."

Betty pouted. "Oh, if you're going to be nasty about it!"

I knew my part. I besought, protested my readiness, willingness, in fact, burning and insatiable desire to compose notes to anybody, everybody—and was in due time forgiven. I pulled out some paper.

"Who is it to?" I asked.

"To Grahme Brown," said Betty.

"My dear!"

"Well?" she queried. Her innocence was delicious.

"I'll answer your faculty summons, your family letters, respond to your bills, even, but how can I write your love-letters?"

Betty laughed. "Oh, most any way. Say what you think will please the man."

"But I won't feel it—it's sheer hypocrisy." I was indignant.

"So it would be if I wrote it—I don't feel it—tonight." And she hummed a bit from the "Belle of New York," and crept farther into the pillows.

So I wrote:

"I don't know how you will take this letter, but you have so often corresponded to my mood of the moment, that I write to you now out of the fullness of my heart—"

"Beautiful start," said Betty, reading over my shoulder, "go on!"

"'Out of the fullness of my heart,'" I mused, "'out of the fullness of my heart—.' Betty, can't you suggest something?"

The tapping on the window stopped and Betty turned and looked at me.

Suddenly the satire of the thing struck us, we laughed and laughed. When she had her breath, Betty reached for the Physiology: "The heart is a valvular pump which works on mechanical principles, the motive power of which is supplied by the contraction of muscular fibres," she read aloud.

In the white heat of such knowledge of organs and functions our English metaphors should be revised.

And, now, when I meet a certain tall friend of ours, my mouth twitches at the recollection of how I once wrote to him, "out of the fullness of my heart."

Alma Mater

REVISED VERSION

Tonight we gladly sing the praise
Of her of whom we are the sons.
Our loyal voices let us raise,
And bless her with our benisons.
Of all fair mothers fairest she,
Most wise of all that wisest be,
Most true of all the true, say we,
Is our dear Alma Mater.

Her mighty learning we would tell,
Though life is something more than lore;
She could not love her sons so well
Loved she not truth and honor more.
We praise her depth of charity,
Her faith that truth shall make men free,
That right shall live eternally,—
We praise our Alma Mater.

O fair young Mother, throned in grace
Beside the azure inland sea,
The mother of a mighty race
Of peaceful conquerors thou shalt be.
Beyond the ages lift thine eyes
To where thy sheltring walls yet rise
Beneath the hope-filled western skies,
Still our dear Alma Mater.

A Modern Fairy Tale

His name was Johnny Thornton. He was big, good-natured and thirty, with gray in the thin hair about his temples, and wrinkles at the corners of his eyes, flecking the dark, permanent shadows beneath them, that conscientious chaperones might recognize and point out his wickedness to their charges. But in addition, there was a whimsical upward twist to the corners of his mouth, which these ladies did not point out, nor did they explain the merry dancing of his eyes and the fair maidens who looked and saw these things without their guidance, could only wonder and dream—who knows what dreams.

It was a winter night and he had come to his bachelor hearth, a little tired, rather cold, and more than a little blue, so that the ice he took from the chest to cool various long drinks was much diminished before the corners of his mouth curled again and the frown faded from over the once more merry eyes. What he had thought is sacred because his mood faded away from the world, with the coals that glowed with its bitterness and deadened as it departed, and only what happened with the return of the mood all his world knew and shall be recorded.

He was smoking his pipe when it happened, sitting before his fire, with a glass in one hand and his long red gown wrapped comfortably about him. The world had returned to peace with him, as everything did before the sun had half circled around it and all was well everywhere. He heard a fluttering of airy things behind him and thought he might be going to sleep, when a little wee voice that sounded like the scent of an Egyptian cigarette said:

"I am come to do your bidding."

He looked up quickly and then jumped to his feet. Turning to the fire, he looked into it for a moment and then drained his watered whiskey. She was still there as he turned slowly around. He looked at her steadily, but she did not disappear or even falter under his stare. He wet his lips and recovered himself.

"How the devil did you get in here with those clothes on?" he asked sharply, for she was wearing a gown a little less tangible than chiffon and a trifle more durable than a dawn-shot mist.

"I am a fairy," she said and the star in her hair twinkled.

"I have no doubt of that," he replied, "but I thought your company was playing in Washington this week."

"I don't know what you mean. The fairy queen sent me to serve you. It is your turn now. You have not commanded one of us since you were a little boy in Egypt a thousand years ago. What are your desires?"

"My desires are many," he faltered, for he had never talked to anyone quite like this before. He didn't know what to say next and she was staring about her in wondering contentment. "Have a drink," he suggested as he pushed the bottle and glasses across the table toward her. She looked at them curiously.

"They are pretty," she said, "but what is this in the bottle? Is it a sleeping potion?"

"It is for some people, if they drink enough of it."

"I am afraid it is an evil spirit."

"Indeed it's not. It's the finest dew of all Scotland's hillsides."

"It is like dew, but what is it?"

"One of my best friends and you must be cold." He poured her a glass of it and let the soda seeth and nibble about the sides of the long glass as he handed it to her. She raised the glass and drank the liquor with a queer little wry face and a grimace of terror intermingled. He smiled at her and she set it down, reassured, as she smiled back.

"It makes me warm," she said. The fairies of Scotland must have worked long filling your potion with mystic heat." He started to laugh, but didn't and she went on. "I was cold. We don't often venture out in this weather and our winter gowns of white mouse skin are all worn out. You see there is so little doing in our line, we cannot afford new clothes."

"I'll arrange that at once," he said. "Here, take my lounging robe," and he slipped out of it quickly and wrapped it about her slight figure. He wheeled his big chair around closer to the fire and snuggled her into it. "Great Scott! haven't you any stockings?"

"Oh, we are very poor now. Everything is so dull. The queen actually hasn't had her crown brightened for ten years and she is so proud, she won't leave the palace."

"Dear me! You don't say!" he observed and poured out another glass for himself. "Won't you have some more-a-dew."

"Really, I don't think I'd better. It makes me feel so queer in my head."

"Bless your little head, of course it does; it's a way it has. But are you sure you are quite comfortable?"

"Oh quite," and she laughed a contented little chuckle, as though she were a waif of a kitten, purring in new found luxury.

"But you must be hungry. Can't I send out for a cold lobster, or some chicken or something?"

"Oh, we never eat. Only mortals do that."

"How lovely! It is an earthly habit. I suppose you have no stomachs, but have you any hearts among you?" She nodded an affirmative. "To be sure. I suppose your hearts take up the space our stomachs do. Do you ever really love?"

"We love everybody."

"How unfortunate! You really can't enjoy it. The only fun there is in loving, is the excitement of keeping but one face at a time locked up in one's heart. Do you kiss all the people you love?"

"I don't know what you mean."

"My child, don't jest. How old are you?"

"Nearly a thousand years, I think. I've forgotten exactly. I'm almost of age."

"I should think you were, but I shall have to remedy your deplorable lack of a proper education." He perched himself upon the arm of the chair and began his lesson.

"Oh, is that kissing?" she interrupted. "I've seen lovers do that. You do it very nicely." He proved her words. "I know what you want me to grant you, it's a sweetheart. But, oh yes, I remember; you have one and she was rude to you. I shall arrange all that tonight, for she is a foolish girl. Do you love me as much as you do her?"

This ending to her chatter brought up a delicate question and he was explaining its distinctions when he became aware there was an earthly male comrade of his midnight hours standing at his elbow, and his lounging robe was hanging over the back of the chair.

MORAL

He had not been asleep, and the next day she wrote him a note saying she was very sorry.

An Old Saw with a New Edge

HE saying goes, "there's many a slip
Between the cup and the ruby lip,"
But the wise old sage forgot to say
What kind of a slip they used in his day;
However we guess, as drinks are few,
'Twas an orange slip with a cherry too.

Snap Shots

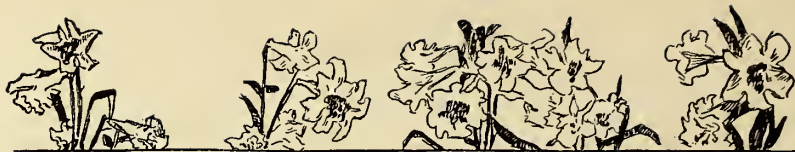

H, Willy, Willy, you incorrigible idiot, Willy! Think I can't read between the lines? Think I don't know what "worthless life" is the exponent of, and can't translate your "loneliness, so sad and strange?" It is older than Cicero, dear boy; more men have studied it; and rendered into plain English prose, it means—a girl! I can even guess which one, unless some Aphrodite, new-risen since I left, emerging from the waves and dripping nakedly, has found you on the shore. But that I do not believe. Is it the red-haired one, Willy? Confess it; the maiden, to be poetic, with sun-gilded locks, divinely tall and (woe is me!) most undivinely freckled. Or is it the little girl, black-haired, coquettish, rolling as to her eyes, who told me once I was so fresh and blooming? Inaudibly I answered she was so blooming fresh, and now perhaps she has snared you in the mesh of her low-lidded glances. You are not the first, nor will you be the last. Or, may be I am unjust, and it is not she. May be it is—but this is profitless work, guessing. Tell me who, at once, and let me comfort you; only never write to me again about a "worthless life," because you saw her in the chapel with another fellow.

We talked till the fire in the grate burned low, and the shadows in the corners crept to our feet. We talked of suicide, and Bentley argued that a man's life is his own—to take or to keep. "And it is logical that one may go voluntarily," said he. "Just as some men will to sleep and to wake and accomplish it, so, I believe, some men die by a self-imposed death sentence—yet without violence." We argued long, and finally he said: "Before I go, get a note that you'll find in Hegel and read it. Do not wait till to-morrow, but get it now." I thought it a strange request, but I had learned that all Bentley's whims meant something, so I crossed the room and found the note: "Good-bye, I have always known I have this power. The time has come. I shall miss you, for I have always loved you. Good-bye." A chill fell upon my heart. I turned to Bentley and touched his hand. It was cold, and when I looked at his face I saw that he was dead.

Fledgely is a friend of mine with whom I like to discuss things, or rather with whom I discuss, for I do not like it. We always get heated, and I lose my temper, and come away angry with Fledgely and disgusted with myself for being angry. The truth is Fledgely cannot argue. He is a clever enough fellow, but his mind travels in a circle, and you never can pin him down to a point. When you think you have him, away he goes around the curve and you have to go over the whole argument with him again. The other night we sat on the porch and talked politics. Fledgely is a strong gold-standard man. He has not studied the subject much, but his prejudices are all in favor of the capitalists and the moneyed men, so I tried to give him a few facts from economics that would help him. As usual he kept dodging the question, and finally refused to see a point when I had made it as plain as day. Somewhat nettled, I left him and came to my room. A moment later, I went out to get my cane which I had left on the porch, and heard him say to Judson, "— good fellow, but he can't argue. He never sticks to the point."

Here and There

PIRIT! No lack of College spirit here. Plenty of it if you go where it is to be found. Same thing you find at Yale or Princeton, strengthened a little by Chicago climate. Same old spirit toward college bills—their size and immutability. Same complaints about the work—this course is dead easy—no use to work—this one is stiff and you'll get sliced—no use to bone. Complaints about the professor's jokes and about food and drink and the landlady and the tailor. Same old search for a rattling good time—without paying for it. Go where college men do congregate and you will find the atmosphere charged with these vapors which condense and are precipitated easily and often. They make up the true college spirit—localized, indefinable and yet permanent.

This theme is about a strange little man with a great red beard, who came out of the Romance library yesterday afternoon shaking his head at the world.

"O-h-h-h!" said he. "The head-ache which is mine!"

"Oh, these head-aches," said I, with ready sympathy. "Is it the bad air?"

"The bad air?" he answered, throwing up his arms. "No, it iss that man Kan-n-t, such a fellow! Hegel is nothing to him, nothing. It iss the—what iss it in the English—the Pure Reason? O-h-h-h! Is not that it? First there is the connection in the brain—the logic—and then above that there iss this Pure Reason. For hours I have study it; no wonder then if I have an ache!"

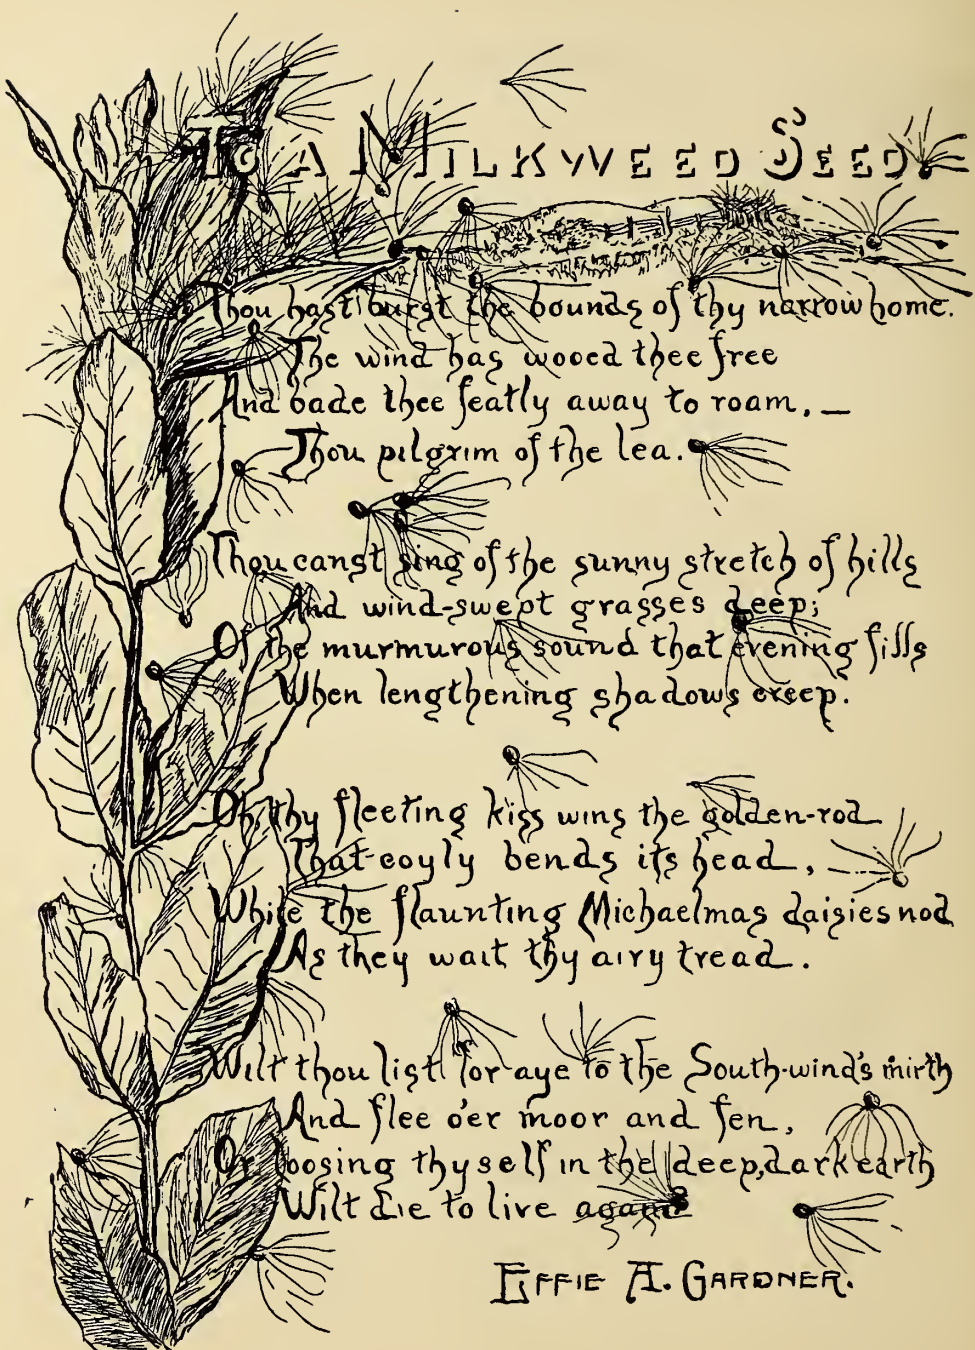

Down the hall came a library girl, old and dry and wrinkled like the covers of her respectable books, and waving his hands Herr Rothbart rushed up to her.

"Who is he, Phil?" said I to the biggest man in the University, who happened by just then.

"Reddy, eh?" Phil said. "He's some fellow or other; there are dozens about."

In one of many classes, at the first assembling of the quarter, there were perhaps twenty men and no woman. There are arguments in plenty to prove co-education is ideal education, but for me the feeling in my own heart as I looked around the class everlastingly refuted them all. A sense of freedom, as if shackles had been stricken off, was included in it; a perception of closer touch with teacher and classmates, and a realization of expanding confidence and power. And then the door opened, and Eve entered, Eve, the eternal, dragging the serpent. She was elderly and ugly to be sure; it was sadly evident that she had dressed in the dark; but had she been the youngest and prettiest of all the college girls it would have made no difference. We were men together before she came, and then we were twenty men before a woman. Perhaps I imagined the rustle of disappointment that went around the class; but I dare swear I saw Doctor M's hard mouth grow harder, and I know my back suddenly bowed as if under a burden, all the heavier because for a little time thrown off.

THE MILKWEED SEED.

Thou hast burst the bounds of thy narrow home.

The wind has wooed thee free
And bade thee featly away to roam, —

Thou pilgrim of the lea.

Thou canst sing of the sunny stretch of hills
And wind-swept grasses deep;

Of the murmurous sound that evening fills
When lengthening shadows creep.

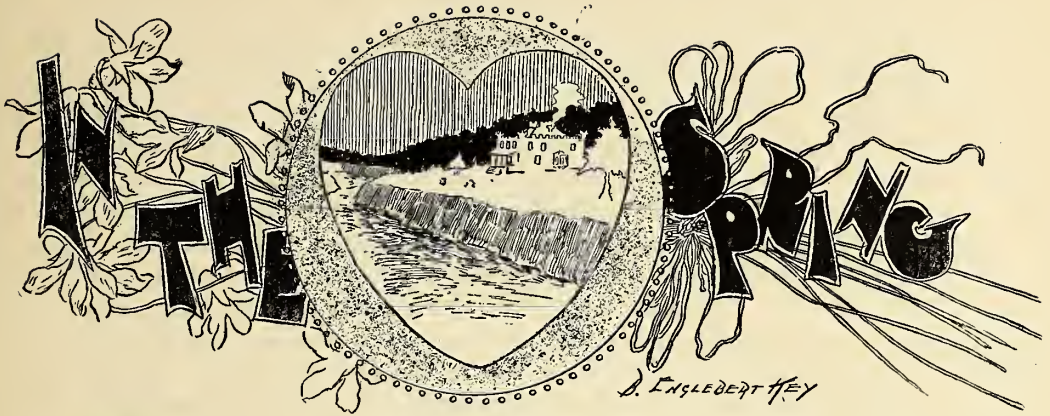

Of thy fleeting kiss wins the golden-rod
That coyly bends its head, —

While the flaunting Michaelmas daisies nod
As they wait thy airy tread.

Wilt thou list for aye to the South-wind's mirth
And flee o'er moor and fen,

Or loosing thyself in the deep, dark earth
Wilt die to live again?

EFFIE A. GARDNER.

THE Colonel's house stands on the right bank of the Mississippi, about twenty miles north of Keokuk, and just outside of Onawanda. The building is of grey stone, and turreted like an iceberg. Back of it a planted wood, covering five acres, lifts through hazel brush; before it a green lawn runs down to the edge of the bluff, ninety feet high, steep as a wall, and standing sheer from the river. Over this bluff Ned had hurled the only dog he ever owned, a spotted fox-terrier six months old. He teased the little beast till it bit him, and in an excess of anger he threw it over. For a week Roxy would not speak to him, and the Colonel never gave him another dog.

The Colonel was the best known man in Onawanda, and the richest. He was tall, taller even than Ned became, when his black hair used to loom in a line-up an inch above everyone else. The Colonel's hair was white, though his mustache was still dark; and in his forehead were three deep wrinkles. One came when his wife died and left him Roxy to bring up as best he might. The second and third Ned had given him. The Colonel stood as stiffly as a major general as far up as his shoulders, but he habitually carried his head bent forward, and did not always raise it even when he spoke to you. The Colonel loved both Roxy and Ned; but it could hardly be said that he approved of Ned.

Ned—his full name was Edward Fitzgerald Carter—was the only son of the Colonel's sister, Emily Frankland, and Edward Fitzgerald Carter, Sr., a gentleman of Kentucky. Ned's mother died soon after Roxy's, and the Colonel almost immediately invited his brother-in-law to live with him. The two Edward Fitzgerald Carters accepted the invitation; but the older did not accept it for long. The death of his wife was for him the beginning of the end. He lived in the Onawanda house for two years. Then one day, Ned being nine years old, his father died. The Colonel himself tied the crape band to Ned's hat, and they followed to the grave together.

Edward Fitzgerald Carter, Sr., had been a quiet man, undemonstrative, fonder of a cigar than conversation. But neither his son nor the Colonel ever forgot him. Nothing was said; and Ned continued to live at Onawanda. For nine years more he and Roxy grew up together, and the Colonel gave the same attention to each; but their characters developed differently. Roxy was a quiet little maid, five years younger than Ned, and as fair as her New England ancestry justified. She did much as she was told; but she worshipped Ned openly and loyally, who did little as he was told, and grew into a reputation that only the Colonel's prominence kept from being notorious. He was at the same time reckless and strong, fearless, and with a dash of cruelty; and he got into more fights and won them more gloriously than any other young man in the vicinity of Onawanda. At eighteen he was tall, very dark, with a New England grimness of face and southern softness of profile that eternally contradicted each other. He could put the sixteen-pound shot thirty-five feet; he could run a hundred yards in eleven seconds, and the half-mile in two minutes more; and he could swim the three-quarter mile of yellow Mississippi that swept the Onawanda bluffs three times in an afternoon. As for the things he could not do: he could not enjoy the poetry of Browning; he could not move in a drawing-room without upsetting a table; and he could not dance. About this time the Colonel began to think of college. When the Colonel grew worried he grew absent minded; and when he grew absent minded he used to spit in his spectacle-case and throw his glasses into the fire. Two pairs melted before he decided to send Ned up to the University; but the decision finally come to, the Colonel acted in haste. Three months after his eighteenth birthday, Ned was regularly enrolled as a student at Chicago.

It was on a day in early October. The field, with the green of summer still upon it, and the haze of a hot sun over it, seemed a setting all out of keeping for the figures it framed. Foot-ball, when the heat of the year is not yet passed, is a very unpleasant game to practice, and a good bit of a farce to watch. The men are untrained and soft, and after every line-up lie about helplessly and pant. There is a deal of desultory kicking—even a green man thinks he can punt, and, a little later, drop-kick. The veterans, the men who are practically sure of their positions, the men who after Thanksgiving will be put on the all-western team, loaf and "give the scrubs a chance." The head coach, who will in a few weeks become so vigorous and dogmatic, smiles and allows the discipline to become lax. He knows the result of overwork when the thermometer stands at eighty degrees. The sub-coaches and the correspondents on the side lines swear, now softly, now loudly, and honestly believe that there is no enthusiasm anywhere; and the correspondents take notes for the first of those discouraging reports that would convince the country that the standard of foot-ball is sinking year by year, only nobody ever believes them. Along the side lines, in the pleasant sun, stand hundreds of students, expressing their loyalty because they have nothing better to do. Later, when the season becomes cold and rainy, the practices will not be so well attended; but there are many out in these sweet October days.

On this particular afternoon, the first of his attendance at Chicago, Ned Carter stood with the rest along the track beside the rope. He was one of a little group of four men—the other three all older than he—and was very much the center of interest. His size and his beauty made him conspicuous; and though he possessed in a large measure that self-confidence and aggressiveness that is called “freshness,” it only added to his prominence. The other three men, representatives of a well-known fraternity, had marked him for their own, and according to their different temperaments they were endeavoring to win his confidence and good will. Never is there better opportunity for the early display of the qualities of a successful politician than in the “rushing” game; and these three men, Alan Dale, Tom Carruthers and Phillip Mann, were three of the best “rushers” in the University, and the three who had done the greatest deeds in the struggle that marked the rise of their fraternity from the second to the first class. They clung closely to Ned now; they appealed to him and subtly flattered him; they forebore to praise him openly and so disgust him; they talked to him frankly and made him one of them.

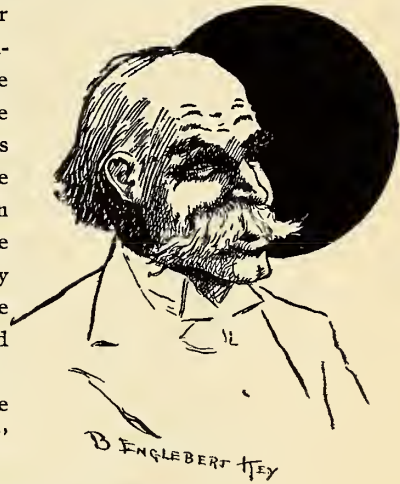

“Why don’t you go in for foot-ball, Carter?” said Dale, the slenderest, frailest, most intellectual looking and “foxiest” Junior in college. “You certainly look to have the build.”

Ned laughed. “Don’t think I care much for the game,” he said. “Those fellows look too hot and dirty to be comfortable.”

“Oh, well, this weather won’t last long” said Carruthers, a man as black as Ned himself, with an open, laughing face, and an air of cordiality that never left him. “Wait till the east winds begin to come in off the lake. Foot-ball is the only thing that will keep you warm then. And it’s the greatest thing ever invented for giving a man standing and credit in the University. Study isn’t in it. Look at me—never failed to lead my class, and yet get no credit because I’m not big enough to play foot-ball.”

“You lead your class backwards into temptation, Tom” said Mann, the third of the trio, thin almost as Dale, plain to ugliness, with a big nose but eyes full of lurking twinkle. Mann had never yet failed to find humor in anything. “If you want Mr. Carter to play foot-ball, tell him it is his duty to the University. If he doesn’t do it then, tell him it’s a better way to get gym. credit than running around a dirt heap in grey underclothes.”

Ned laughed again. “I read in the papers,” he explained in a cheerful loud voice, "that the coaches kick the men when they didn't obey orders, and if a man kicked me I'm afraid I'd get mad and make a fool of myself."

"That's a Yale custom that we haven't learned yet," said Carruthers. "All the kicking here is incidental, and mostly aimed at the umpire. So is the slugging, except occasionally—as, for instance, there!"

The hot weather had made the players cross and irritable. There were a suspicious number of ugly falls on the scrub side, and the 'Varsity complained constantly of holding. Suddenly, after a scrimmage, and just as Carruthers spoke, two men faced each other in quick anger; there were two swinging blows; and then the eye of the coach fastened itself there, and in another moment the two men, ruled off for the afternoon, were walking together across the field.

"Coburn and Wray—Coburn lost his head again," said Dale contemptuously. But in Ned's black eyes the joy of battle smouldered.

"Is that in the game?" he said.

"Very much in it," laughed Mann. "The universities are trying to legislate it out, but human nature is tough."

"Well that must be a pretty good game," said Ned. "I believe I'll try it."

Dale looked at him curiously. "Sluggers don't make good players," he said.

"Oh, I don't know," said Ned, cheerfully. The next day began the career of Edward Fitzgerald Carter, sometime guard of the University of Chicago eleven—a career that, had it followed out to its natural end, would have remained as unparalleled unto this day. What it was, you remember; and it comes unto this story only slightly. A full account of it will never be written, but anyone who is curious may go to the head coach and ask; and if the head coach is in a good humor on that day, and has discovered a possible new phenomenon, and is convinced that he is not talking for publication—the conviction must be pressed home to him, and that is not easy—then he will unfurl his mind and set out zig-zag over a sea anecdote, and reminiscence, and dry philosophy, until he reaches the port of lost opportunities in Foot-ball; and there he will drop anchor and rest, saying, with a regretful sigh—"Yes, that was Ned Carter — "Hoss" Carter — and if I had had him four years instead of two—," and then you must go away very softly, for the head coach will have forgotten you, and it is not well to interrupt his musings.

It was a year later, at the beginning of his sophomore work, that Ned began to go out in University society. His position there was from the first pretty firmly established. His freshman triumphs in foot-ball and on the track team would have been enough in themselves to secure him a "bid" from most of the fraternities; his good looks and the Colonel's money brought the rest into line. Ned was the "hardest rushed" man of his year, and had known the joy of refusing many bids. Dale, Carruthers and Mann never let him go; and in the spring, when he was eligible, he was initiated into Alpha Kappa Pi. They urged him at once to go to those receptions and teas that are for the Freshmen the Introduction to the Study of Society; and though he resisted successfully for three months, he succumbed in the fall, and "did" where he was "bid." As I have said, he was at once a success.

It is true that Ned Carter never learned the art of making pretty speeches. It is true that he was never a graceful dancer, though, after a fashion, he learned to dance. It is true that his voice was unmodulated and harsh, and that his laughter had a touch of the crackling of thorns. But if he did not say the right thing, he did not say the wrong; he openly admired the girls he met, and there is much in that; and he was "certainly," as even the Seniors admitted "a very good looking fellow." He went out, and he went out, to teas, to dinners, to receptions, to everything that was consistent with the strictest of training rules. He admired every one impartially, and told his thoughts freely to the men of his fraternity. One day, day, however, he met Miss Carnegie; and from that time he spoke his thoughts no more. He went on with his foot-ball playing, adding ever new laurels. Against Northwestern he played well, against Wisconsin better, against Michigan best of all. A story might be written about every game. The old romance of the knight and his lady is as fresh to-day as when lances lay in rest and armor gleamed; and Alsace Carnegie, by or against her will, inspired Ned Carter to worthier efforts every time he saw her. He bore a charm and was never hurt. When he had the ball he never stopped running, and on defense he never considered the possibility that anyone else might tackle the runner. He won the heart of the head coach; and always, between halves, he looked about for Miss Carnegie. She usually came to the games in her drag, with sometimes one man, sometimes three, attending her. She took her place at the end of the East grand stand, where the earlier carriages always moved to make room for her. There Ned would look for her; and when he had found her he would play harder than before. Passion is more effectual than ginger tonic.

The position of Alsace Carnegie in the University had never been satisfactorily settled. The women indeed did not definitely approve of her by offering her the shelter of a club, and so she remained an "independent." There were also, of course, those rumors, whispered of between dances and in the clink and clatter of teas, that always hang like a haze over a pretty girl not like all the other pretty girls. Men said of her that she was "nervy;" occasionally that she was "easy." Plenty there were bold enough, and fond enough of beauty, to take her to dances, and to ride on her drag to the games. But she had few callers among the men of the University. Her record as a student was above criticism. That was established by the evidence of the dozens of people who were curious enough to look it up. She was neither very dark nor very fair; her eyes were as grey as a cloud; she was rather small than short, and slenderly built. Her feet and her waist were the admiration of one half and the envy of the other half, of the University. She could not sing, nor play, and she danced only poorly. But such as she was she appeared before Ned Carter; and he thought her a goddess, and worshipped her—not reverently, but passionately. From the day in early November when he first met her, he steadily hurled his attentions at her; and in less than two months he had asked her to marry him.

Consider now what he was. Edward Fitzgerald Carter, aged nineteen and one-half years, sophomore at the University of Chicago; on the outside tall, strong and dark, on the inside a bundle of impulses and passions, uncontrolled and successful; joint heir-to-be with Roxana Frankland, of all the land and estate of Colonel William Prentiss Frankland—and that not little. Alsace Carnegie laughed in his face. He asked her again, and she refused him point blank. He asked her again and she left the room. He took his hat and coat, went out of the Hall and across the campus; and the same light smouldered in his black eyes that flamed there in a game.

“I shall ask her,” he said to himself, “until she consents—or until I kill her.”

That was just after the Christmas vacation, and he had still in his pocket the photograph of Roxy she had given him. He had known, when he was in Onawanda, that when he came back to Chicago he should ask Alsace Carnegie to marry him, but he had not thought it necessary to tell either Roxy or the Colonel about it. In a dim and misty way he had sometimes thought the Colonel wanted him to marry Roxy. He took her photograph out now and looked at it, then smiled and put it back.

“Roxy, little girl,” he said, “there isn’t enough of the devil in you.” Which might be taken as a reflection on Miss Alsace Carnegie.

The next part of the life of Ned Carter and Alsace Carnegie might have been called the “hare and hound,” except for the popular estimate of the character of those animals. Ned saw Miss Carnegie at receptions, concerts, dinners, dances—the whole round—and always he asked her to marry him. He called on her, and they talked of the same thing. Sometimes, in the depths of the carriage, returning from a dance, they two alone, Ned’s passion would almost master him, and he would grow fierce and demand. But Miss Carnegie could be as cold and hard as he was eager and angry; she was emphatically, in spite of the rumors among the men that she was “easy,” a girl who could take care of herself. She was always and everywhere on her guard; she fenced well, and she kept herself out of danger. And usually Ned’s question “Will you marry me?” was quietly put; he asked it so often, that winter and spring, that it grew almost formal. They two were always together. The University gossiped, as the University will, when other men dropped away, and on the campus and off the campus Alsace Carnegie and Ned Carter were sufficient for each other. But Ned cared not a bit, and Miss Carnegie seemed to be as little bothered.

January and February drifted away, and March blew itself out. The rains and breezes of April made the yard soggy and unpleasant, and May dried it up again and wrote across it in great yellow letters that to the uninitiated looked like splashes of sunshine, "Spring." There were again the beginnings of tennis, and the track men got out of the gymnasium with cries of joy. Nobody ever crossed the campus alone. It was the halcyon season of a co-educational university—the season when no one studies books, and even the deans look life in the face and smile; when the lake finally puts away the grey and dons the blue that lasts the summer through; when Seniors grow sad and freshmen merry; when the year is almost done. A new fraternity had come into the University, and celebrated its advent with a dance. As usual, Ned Carter "took" Alsace Carnegie; as usual he asked her to marry him; as usual she laughed.

After the dance, when it was very late, the two came home in a carriage together. When they reached the college yard the dawn was in the air. The driver turned as usual up the road to the halls, but Alsace stopped him.

"Ned," she said, "tell him to drive straight across the campus to the Ellis Avenue entrance; we'll get out there."

"What are you going to do, Alsace?" said Ned, curiously.

"Never mind," said Miss Carnegie.

The carriage crunched across the dim yard, and stopped beside Cobb, grim and heavy and bulky. The two got out. "That's all right," said Ned to the driver, and the obedient Irishman whipped away. Then she faced him under the grey sky.

"We'll walk across the campus and talk it out, Ned," she said.

"What do you mean?" he asked stupidly.

Alsace laughed. "You have been asking me every day, sometimes twice a day, for the last four months, to marry you," she said. "You think you know what you want; but you don't at all, and I'm going to prove it to you right now."

Ned smiled pleasantly. "Go on," he said.

"What do you mean when you say you want me to marry you?" asked Miss Carnegie.

"I mean," said Ned slowly, "merely that I want to marry you."

"When?" she said abruptly.

"Now," he answered as promptly. She curled her lip.

"If you mean," she said, that you want to be engaged to me—to touch me, and hold my hand, and kiss me, to fondle me, and have me brush your forehead, and then throw me over and wait for the next girl, you are wasting your time. I'm not that kind of a girl. If you want to marry me—marry me now—you can. I'm willing. Your good old uncle won't approve, and you'll probably get into all sorts of trouble with the Faculty. As compensation, however, you will have me. You don't know anything about me, who I am, or who my parents are, or anything at all. I don't propose to tell you anything. I shan't even tell you whether I am honest, as girls go. I say just this: If you want to take me up to Milwaukee and marry me there, all nice and comfortable—you can. I shan't make an objection. There's a train that goes at half past two this afternoon; we can go up on that. Otherwise, you stop, forever, asking me your question and seeing me."

"There is a boat," said Ned, "that leaves at nine this morning; why shouldn't we take that?"

She stopped in her walk—they had been slowly drawing near the Hall—and looked at him. Her face was pale, and her grey eyes looked very large and almost black by contrast. She was so little and frail and fair in her ball gown, in the gloom under the trees that line the walk—her hair curling away from her forehead like a halo—that she must have seemed like a spirit to Ned. Then she said:

"Do you mean it?"

"Don't talk nonsense," said Ned. He may be forgiven. It was a strain that twenty-year old nerves are not meant to bear. She bowed her head, and when she looked up she was crying. At the instant a shade, a faint wave of light, slipped over all the east. The sun was rising over the quadrangles as Ned took her in his arms.

But she struggled free. "No, Ned," she said; "no, it won't do, even if—if—we are going to be married." Between her tears and laughter she was almost hysterical. "There, the sun's up and the watchman is looking at us. Get me over to the Hall quick, before anyone else sees us. I've got a key. I musn't have a bad reputation if I'm going to marry you, Ned."

At the door of the Hall she paused only a second. "It will have to be the train, Ned," she said. "I'm afraid I can't get ready for the boat. Meet me at one o'clock on the Walker steps. I won't have a satchel." Then she slipped inside, and left Ned alone.

He walked again across the campus, light now, but absolutely still and sleepy, and found the watchman sitting in his chair at the door of Cobb. The old man looked at him curiously, and Ned remembered that he was in evening dress.

"Do you smoke?" he said. "Will you get yourself some cigars with this, and—if you say anything you may get two very nice people into trouble."

"All right, Mr. Carter," said the watchman, who was not too old to wink. Then Ned, with very strange feelings in his throat and chest, walked to the fraternity house.

There were four men there sitting around a table playing seven-up and trying to make up their minds to go to bed. All of them were, like Ned, in evening dress, and all had been to the dance. Three were Dale, Carruthers and Mann, who, more than any others, had induced Ned to join Alpha Kappi Pi. The fourth was Morris Atkinson, a fellow of Ned's own class. When Ned entered they greeted him with a mock cheer and pounded on the table.

"With a ho, ho, ho, see the gay Lothario!" hummed Carruthers. "Let's see, Ned, whom did you take last night?"

The others laughed. Ned frowned. "Hurt your little feelings, old man?" said Carruthers. "Well, don't hurt me. She's a very nice girl, and she gave me a dance to-night, which was good of her, though she did step on my toes three times. We sat out the encore; I think I hurt my ankle, or something," and Carruthers winked.

Ned took the cards and shuffled them in one hand, resting lightly on the edge of the table.

"When a fellow," he said, "Isn't enough of a gentleman to know when he is offensive, we show him—like this," and he threw the pack into Carruthers' face, sharply. They fell and fluttered to the floor, and every man was on his feet.

"What do you mean!" cried Mann, startled out of his humorous composure. Nobody else spoke. Carruthers slowly plucked a card away where it had caught the edge of his waistcoat, and his face reddened and then paled again. Ned's hand still rested on the rim of the card table. At last Alan Dale broke the silence.

"I think you must be drunk, Carter," he said, in his high, even voice. "You would better apologize at once, and then go and sleep it off."

Ned's voice rose like a torrent.

"Apologize?" he said. "Apologize to a man who has insulted a girl, better than any of his sisters ever dared to be? A man who has insulted me—a man who hasn't the courage to resent a blow! I'll see him damned first—and you, too?"

Carruthers stood as still as a stone. Dale spoke again and there was a note of wonderment in his voice.

"You are certainly drunk, Carter," he said. "Carruthers did not insult you or any one else, as you know. He made a perfectly harmless speech; such an one as would be delicacy itself, contrasted with most of yours. You have insulted him now, past apology, unless you are too drunk to know what you are doing. Tom, you shut up. Carter presumes on his physical strength. We'll try something else."

Dale and Carruthers left the room. Atkinson said, "Shall I help you up to bed, Ned?" Ned gave no answer, and Atkinson followed the others. Mann alone stayed, and stared at Carter.

"What's the matter, old boy?" he said. "Are you engaged to her?"

"None of your damned business," said Ned.

"Oh, yes, it is," said Mann. "It is the business of every man who is as proud of you as I have been. It's the business of every man in this fraternity, you know. You're not drunk; that's too easy. I want to know what the matter is."

Ned came round the table to where the other stood, and faced him, towering above him.

"Phil," he said, "old man, I'll tell you something. I'm going to be married this afternoon to Miss Carnegie. Do you think I'm going to let any damn man talk about my wife, Phil?"

"For God's sake!" said Mann.

"That's right, Phil. We agreed on it only half an hour ago. I came straight home, and heard this fellow abusing her. I suppose he said a lot of things before I came. He'd better not say any more while I'm here."

"Have you made up your mind about this thing?" said Mann. Ned nodded.

"You know it means expulsion from the University, and—forgive me—all sorts of nasty talk."

"I suppose so."

"You know, if you don't apologize to Carruthers, it probably means expulsion from the fraternity?"

"I don't give a damn," said Ned.

"What time do you go?"

"Leave here at one. I'm going to bed now. Good night." Carter turned on his heel and left. Said Mann:

"Oh, you damn, damn, damn fool!" And again, "What can I do?"

That same day, by a Methodist minister at Milwaukee, were married Edward Fitzgerald Carter, aged (nearly) twenty, and Alsace Carnegie, aged twenty-three. Immediately afterwards Ned sent off two telegrams. One, to Colonel W. P. Frankland, Onawanda, Iowa, read as follows:

"Married here this afternoon. Shall we come home? Will probably be expelled. Ned."

The other, to Philip Mann, contained the one word "Done," and was signed E. F. Carter.

Properly there is no more to the story. But the head coach, who has since visited Onawanda, will tell you differently. He went out a year and a few months after this, when September was shading into October, to induce—secretly, but without the offer of money, which constitutes the crime—to induce Ned Carter, sometimes guard on the eleven, to come back to his old place. The University had forgiven him, said the coach, and would gladly take him back; he could go and complete such a reputation in foot-ball as the West has never yet rung to. To the coach's mind, that seemed reason enough for anyone. But Ned laughed.

"I'm an old married man, now," he said. "I have to look after the Colonel's property, and he couldn't spare me. Besides, if I came, Alsace would have to come, and how could the Colonel and Roxy spare Alsace? Besides—let me show you something." And then Ned opened a case that hung against the wall. What was in it the head coach will not tell you; but this it was: Two letters, two pins, and a motto. One letter, signed by the president, and pinned by the college pin, was the notice of dismissal from college for a year. The other letter, signed by the secretary of the chapter and pinned by the Alpha Kappa Pi pin, was the notice of expulsion from the fraternity. And running around and between both letters was the motto:

"What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder."

Evening

Down western slopes the sun has climbed full slowly,
The breezes murmur that the day must die;
The breath of night, like incense faint and holy,
Rises to heaven, darkening the sky.

The little ripples on the sand-shore waking
Whisper together of the distant deep,
Chatter together, the calm silence breaking,
Whisper again, and so sink back to sleep.

The purple gloom, across the water's chillness,
Hangs like a curtain, till an unseen hand
Draws it aside, and, charioted in stillness,
The white moon rides out o'er the shadowy land.

Senior Division Meeting

“HE time has come,” the Prex he said,
“To talk of many things :
Of Law-Schools, and the Man who Hates,
And why the choir sings,
And of our frequent cabbage-heads
Who take themselves for kings.

“ Division-meetings, and debates,
And gym suits gray and queer,
Of all the funny brood of Deans,
And why we have them here.
(The student dropped upon the ground
A sympathetic tear.)

“ Of what the teachers’ salaries are,
And what they really get ;
Of what John D. remarked to me
The day that we first met ;
And how I grasped his nether limb—
I’m pulling at it yet.

“ Of how myself and Mr. Staggs
Are working for the West ;
Of correspondents for the press,
Who are our chiefest pest ;
And why the dances close at one,
Just when the fun is best.

“ Of these, and many other things
Which—may I say—concern
The Student Body as a whole,
Your time has come to learn.
Present your questions one by one,
I’ll answer them in turn.

“ But first, our time just now is up,
My secretaries say,
And next week, too, I see I must (I’m sorry) be away.
This chat we’ll—shall we say—postpone
Until some other day.”

People Who Pose

AGAINST the white glare of the electric lights the trees cast inky shadows; the gray buildings loomed up vaguely on the campus, and across the soft spring air came the sound of foot-steps, leisurely or hasty, and an occasional burst of laughter. A girl in a second-story window, peering out over the quadrangle, turned from her survey to call "come in," in answer to a rap on the door. Another girl entered, tall, slender and graceful, as could be discerned even in the dim light afforded by the distant lamps.

"Oh, it's you Madge!" The girl in the window moved to make room for the new-comer beside her on the couch. "That's right, make yourself comfortable. So, he's gone at last."

"At last."

"Bert?"

"Yes. Yonder he goes."

Together they watched a solitary figure in a light suit, swinging across the campus towards the men's halls. Then the first girl turned to her companion with a questioning expression.

"Madge," she began, "tell me honestly, do you like Bert very much?"

"N—no."

"I thought not. I've been thinking about it all evening—ever since I found you'd gone walking with someone, presumably Bert. Now Bert's a nice fellow—good looking, plenty of pocket-money, and all that, but he's uninteresting as another woman's troubles. And you know it; yet you grant him loads of time and attention, while I —"

"While you?"

"Am nice to people that I really like. Madge, what do you do it for?"

Madge sat for a moment, chin on hand, as if pondering the question. Then,

"Well," she said, slowly, "I believe it's my pose. Everyone has one, and since I came I've posed as the girl who is equally nice to everyone, and so—well, I have to be nice to a lot of uninteresting people sometimes."

She spoke indifferently, but with a sudden interest looked at her friend, in a quizzical fashion.

"You have a pose," she remarked, "yes, you. And it's the 'sincere' pose. Well, you have your reward. Mr. Rankin said the other day that 'By Jove! to win Agnes Farrel's friendship was to win the genuine article.'"

"He paid me a charming compliment; he couldn't have said a kinder thing."

"Ah-ha, Miss Agnes, see how pleased you are! You feel a compliment like that to be the reward of conscious merit, the reward that comes after labor. Oh, don't get mad. Everyone poses. Tene, for example. Innocency is her watch-word, so she opens her brown eyes very wide, says 'Honestly, do you mean that?' and refers to her mother as 'my mamma.'"

"And Louise?"

"Oh, Lou is worldly-wise and 'sperienced; vide three broken engagements. Poses, in both cases. Louise voluntarily shouldering the blame for that late Wednesday revel, shielded about six people. Tene was so shocked that she had to spread the thing all over college, just to explain how shocked she was."

"Do you think the men pose?"

"Rather, and without so much finesse." As Madge spoke the sound of retreating footsteps made her look out of the window.

"There," she exclaimed, "there goes one of the inveterates. His is the poster pose. His sentences are splotches of color; his general attitude pseudo-dramatic. Admire him? Of course I do. He is clever and original. But I'm being epigrammatic. Now," thoughtfully, "there's Billy—Billy McKee. He's sympathetic, if you like. If you have the blues, he's been there himself. If you are jubilant, the world's too small for him. If you want a lark, you're just the girl, and if it's short stories you crave, why a grate-fire, an interesting book, and an interesting girl, as he confidentially assures you, are the summum bonum of existence."

"You are simply horrid. I think Mr. McKee is lovely."

"Yes, he is. But he's human. And did you ever strike him in an off mood? Well, you have something exciting in store for you."

"How about Jack?"

"Jack?" Madge laughed. "Oh, Agnes, Agnes. I knew you'd ask. Jack, the worldly-minded—Jack the spiritualist—Jack, the paternal, who gives you advice about things you told him yourself; why Jack is delicious!"

"Don't prejudice me until spring is over."

"Prejudice you! Jack is a darling, but—well, see here. Isn't he—doesn't he— isn't it all too rich!"

"Rich! I should say so! Why, Madge, he—"

"Don't tell me. I know all about it. I've gone with him myself."

The Worst Part of the Game

As the 'Varsity came tumbling over the ropes "Brindle" Brown felt that he had to make a tear. For yesterday he was only an ambitious sub rather under weight, but today found him regular quarter-back with a responsibility upon his shoulders that Napoleon might have envied. Yesterday, when he heard one of the coaches say the captain, "If young Brown will only interfere hard, he'll do," he walked away with stiffened shoulders and a pugnacious chin feeling very sorry for the other side, but today as he trotted out among the five-yard lines his courage was so mixed with nervousness that he had to stop and prove to himself by logical reasons that courage really had not left him in the lurch.

Nor could he keep his eyes long away from the other end of the field where they were. He'd no idea they were such big fellows; they looked like all out-doors; and they seemed so terribly unconcerned as they passed the ball about. And now he stood, fascinated with interest, staring at them while a queer, leaking feeling passed down his spine and settled at the pit of his stomach.

"Brown!"

"Brindle" jumped at the word, for the captain's voice rang sharp, "Come and handle the ball!"

He began passing to the full-back, every now and then stealing a look down-field just to see what they were doing.

"I may get a line on their play," he murmured to himself in case he needed an excuse. And then the cheering in the grandstand began for the individual players and that caught his attention. Would they cheer him? he wondered hypocritically. He bated his breath to hear better. How smooth he felt when they rolled out:

"Rah! Rah! Rah! Brindle Bro-o-own!"

"'Varsity this way," sung out the head coach; and as they gathered close together listening to the incisive last words the little quarter-back found the arm of one of the guards, a senior, about his shoulders. He looked up with conscious pride into the brown eyes that smiled and winked at him as the head coach said:

"Now every man to his place, and remember, fellows, play like blazes!"

The other side scattered down field like the men on a well broken chess-board, while the 'Varsity lined up to kick off. The full-back fussed with the ball with vexing deliberation, as though he was merely trying to make it look more artistic to the grandstand, and "Brindle" again began to feel that queer, leaky feeling settle upon him when the referee's clear voice rang out: "Ready Northwestern? Ready Chicago? Play ball!" Then the little quarter-back's muscles grew tense; he set like a sprinter, and as he raced down under the kick he had to shut his teeth upon the joy that leaped up within him. The grandstand, the cheering, his own mental state, the whole world, had been left in the center of the field; he could see and think of nothing but that one, purple-legged half-back into whose outstretched arms he saw the shiny, sailing oval would descend.

Life and Endowment Insurance.

ENDOWMENT INSURANCE IN THE NORTHWESTERN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE CO. OF MILWAUKEE may be secured by healthy men in amounts from $1,000 to $75,000. By keeping up the annual premiums (less dividend reductions) a man may be as absolutely certain of receiving his Endowment at the end of the fixed period, or that it will go to his estate in case of previous death, as if he were the owner of a U. S. Bond for an equal amount. Right here, see how much more accessible and available a NORTHWESTERN Endowment policy is than a Government bond. Suppose you say you will buy a Government bond for $10,000. What does it cost? Anyway $11,000. You are 25 years old and just married. You cannot afford to pay any principal sum for investment or protection, and you need at least $10,000 Life Insurance. Now, less than 3% on $10,000 at first (and less than 2% annually before you get through) will buy $10,000 Life Insurance—just as good as a Government Bond—containing an absolute guaranty of cash to yourself at age 55 if you live till then. In the one case, you pay 110% of the principal cash down. In the other you pay less than 2½% a year in the average until you receive the principal, with promise that if you die even the first year the whole amount goes immediately to your wife, and the remaining 29 installments of premium payments are cancelled. Where in all the financial world can you purchase a contract equal to this; a contract containing so many guarantees and advantages with so little outlay of money?

Men do not now say that they "Do not believe in Life Insurance;" or that they "never expect to take any." What they do say is, that they "are not yet quite ready," or have not yet "decided upon the company." Of course, the best time to get Life Insurance is when we are sure we can pass examination. Even tomorrow may be too late. The "best company" is the one which the consensus of opinion of men insured for years in all the leading companies, pronounces the best. There are a number of excellent companies. Patrons of all commend the company they are in. The difference in testimony is this: Of other companies they write "They are good." Of the Northwestern they say, "It is best." Such testimony from personal experience of men who have carried policies, in all the leading companies for years is worth money to YOU. Bishop William Stevens Perry of Iowa, just deceased, carried for years a number of policies in the Northwestern. In an autograph letter he recently said, "My experience with the Northwestern has been so satisfactory that I wish all my insurance was in that Company." Hundreds of others say the same thing.

Before insuring your life send for the pamphlet "Over Their Own Signatures." containing several hundred fac-simile autograph letters from leading men, giving their experience and policy records in the Northwestern and other companies. Sent pre-paid to any address. Men desiring information about policy, or young men of integrity, tact and good address, not yet established in business, and with disposition to hunt for a thing instead of staying in an office and waiting for it to come, are invited to address or call upon

To My Chum

Jimmy, old boy, there is a lot
Of so-called poetry extant—
A lot of sentimental rot
And sickening, melancholy rant—
All about girls—or “maidens”, rather,—
And “love” and “lips” and “slaves” and “queens,”
And all such soft, insipid lather.
You know, and I know what it means;
It means the author's versifying
Just to amuse himself or pass
The time. It sometimes means he's lying.
It mostly means that he's an ass.
And if a fellow thinks that's a fun,
All right. But, Jim, it makes me hot
To read real poets and to run
Against this omnipresent rot.
For even Byron, you will find—

But whoa! I'm getting off the track;
I didn't start to write a grind.

Where was I at? Hem!—let's turn back.
I made a slight animadversion
On certain poets' watery brew
To introduce my main assertion,
Which, Jim, old boy, refers to you.
Girls are all very well to josh
And dance with, I admit that, Jim;
But as for being friends, it's bosh—
You might as well try cherubim.
And so, old boy, I quickly tire
Of soft effusions on affection
And damn the poet for a liar
And drop him from my recollection.
For, Jim, I like you, and I swear
Of no girl can I say the same.
I like to meet you anywhere,
At any time, in any game.
I always feel at home with you,
Perfectly unconcerned and free.
I know the converse too is true—
You could come back with this at me.

You think you're good friends with a girl
(I know how 'tis and so do you know),
When suddenly around she'll whirl
And get as mad as mamma Juno.
What for? You said what isn't proper.
It's always “propers” “rights” and “wrongs”!
You always have to have a stopper
And handle her with sugar tongs.
So I choose you. Your paw, old boy—
And also, please, a cigarette.
My turn to buy the festive brai,
Or yours? Which is it? I forget.
Well, what's the difference? Here you go.—
Ho! Busse, fill 'em to the brim.
This is the girls—this foam I blow,
And now, here's looking at you, Jim!

The curriculum of this school of Medicine requires a proper preliminary education. Students will be required to take four years of study in the college, devoted to laboratory, didactic and clinical instruction, to recitations and to manual training in the use of instruments and appliances.

Instruction is given in two capacious, well-lighted edifices. The new building contains five large laboratories, in which are conducted the practical laboratory courses in Anatomy, Physiology and Histology, Chemistry, Materia Medica, Pathology and Bacteriology.

The old building is devoted to instruction by clinics, didactic lectures, and by numerous important practical courses in manual training in manipulations and in the use of the instruments employed in medicine, surgery, obstetrics and specialties.

Manual training in all departments of medicine is a special feature of the instruction in this college. Systematic recitations, conducted in five commodious recitation rooms, are regarded as a most important means of teaching.

With over seventy professors and instructors and with ample room and appliances, this school is able to furnish its classes with the most approved systematic education in medicine.

Physicians and medical students are invited to visit the laboratories and to inspect the educational appliances of this school.

For further information and for announcements apply to the College Clerk or to the Secretary.

Francesca

GIUSEPPE was like the sunshine of his own Italy, but gossip rumbled that he smiled to much upon Magda the wife of his brother, Antonio. Now Antonio was morose, had a surly temper and was often away from his wife for days together while Giuseppe owned the most engaging smiles, didn't know how to get angry, and besides was always by to lend a cheerful hand and help speed the dingy hours. And in these facts—I learned them afterwards—lies Magda's whole excuse which you may, or may not admit according to your moral training and your knowledge of the people, and the judgment these demand.

On this particular Sunday I swung round the corner into the Italian neighborhood remarking how the sun lighted up the ugly, squalid street; thinking Giuseppe a picturesque figure as with a red kerchief tied loose about his throat he sipped at a huge bowl of saffron colored risotto and waved his spoon and smiled up at a window where I could see only a red geranium bowing to the sun and I was smiling too when suddenly and noiselessly a little darker man passed me from behind like a chill shadow. Ignorant of the issue I kept still; gay and unconscious of fate Giuseppe waved his spoon at the flower when a quick scream from its window caused him to drop his bowl and turn. But it had scarcely smashed upon the pavement before he fell, stricken beside it while Antonio after flinging a stained knife at the window where the red geranium nodded fled up the garish street.

When the ambulance came Giuseppe was quite dead. The morbid crowd followed on after the corpse, leaving but two of us where Giuseppe had lately stood; myself wondering about the window and a starved cur that eyed me suspiciously as it greedily lapped up a pool of yellow risotto that had collected in the gutter.

An Old Love

In the days when I was a little, little boy, thought my grandfather the oldest living man, and felt a vague uneasiness lest after all the teamster round the corner should be a stronger man than Sampson; and when I grew a little older and barked my shins climbing the big walnut tree in the side yard; and a little older still and made a two-pronged "sling-shot" and killed robins with it; right up to the time when I began to wander with "Harry Castleman" and "Frank" in an enchanted, adventure-haunted land, and so put away childish things—in brief, that is, from my fifth to my eighth year, I was in love. With an angel. Her name was Gracie Titcomb. I have forgotten what she looked like, though she must have been dark and chubby, for I was slim and fair. But I remember I loved her long and faithfully; and when yesterday, rummaging through my boxes, I found a little card with a faded, straggling inscription "From Gracie, Christmas 1883," I let my cigarette go out thinking of her. Then I went down to write my daily letter to Marie.

Sleepy Time

The shadows deepen on the hill;
I hear a lonely whippoorwill.
The twilight heals all labor scars;
Above Craig's Mountain peep the stars.
The purring leaves, the breathing herds,
The hushing croon of brooding birds,
The drowsy hum of insect flight,
The downy footfall of the night,
Are breathing secrets in my ear;
They tell me Sleepy Time is near;
They tell me thou art coming soon,
With all thy train, O summer Moon.
A dreamy peace swims in my brain,
Like breath of woodland after rain;
My soul's at rest, hushed on the sea
Of undisturbed tranquility;
The knotty problems of the day
Melt into mist and fade away;
Time's roaring wheels no longer jar;
I hear the dream-bells from afar.
My eyelids droop, all burden's lift;
My hands relax, my soul's adrift.
Dream crowds on dream, while Love and Hope
Shift the bright kaleidoscope.
I lose my way, and grope and guess
In slumber's mazy wilderness;
I weave on childhood's glorious loom,
Or wade knee-deep in clover bloom,
Or float on Lethe' bosom deep,
A wanderer in the land of sleep.

The Fountain

Just a drop
At the top,
Like a beautiful gem
In the pearl diadem
Of a nymph of the sea,
With her hair wild and free,
Streaming back through the mist
In a multiform twist,
O'er the white robe of spray
That encircles away
This dream-world of laughter and song.
And at last in the marble-edged pool
It dallies, deliciously cool,
Where the sunbeams are drowned in the waves,
And the gold-fish in idleness laves,
And the breezes dream all the day long.

A drop with a flow
And a strange undertow
That sucks the drop back
To be drowned in the black
Labyrinth of confusion and vortex of night ;
Hid from the manifold life-breath of light ;
Lost to the life of the dew on the lea,
To awake in the larger, the life of the sea.

This life is a flow
With a strange undertow ;
With a rainbow and pearl,
And an unending whirl
Of laughter and tears
That combine through the years
The turmoil of the sea
And the peace of the stars
With the mountain rill's glee
And the frenzy of wars ;
Ever leaping from basin to pool, out of breath,
To be tranquil at last in the valley of death.

A drop
At the top,
Like a dew-pearl alone
On the top of the mountain
And close to the throne ;
Millions united, then ripples, then rills
That were braided together on star-hovered hills,
Leaping in cascades and mad cataracts
Till they reach the low valleys and sleep in the sod,
To awaken again in the likeness of God.

This Law School recognizes that the study of law should properly follow the completion of a college course, and that the law school is, in its nature, a graduate school. The School is conducted, not as a commercial enterprise, but as a regular department of the Northwestern University, with a permanent faculty of specialists. The work expected of students is essentially university work. Over one-third of the students in the Law School possess academic degrees; among these are thirteen graduates of the University of Chicago. The Law School course covers three years, but special provision is made for college graduates who study law in college. College graduates may receive credit for college work in law to the extent of one-half year's work in the Law School. Students entering with with such credit are permitted to complete the course in two years. For circulars or other information, address the Secretary,

The Shattered Elopement

A Novel in Two Chapters, by Blue Jeans Libbey

CHAPTER I.

THE MEETING

Regynold Hotfoot Clubbige stood at the corner of two lonely streets. The gloom was heavy about him; and the cool autumn wind blew the dust in little eddies about his feet, and brought down the rustling leaves upon his shining silk hat. He drew his handsome, forty-dollar top-coat more closely about his manly form, and beat nervously with his foot upon the unsympathetic pavement. Suddenly a neighboring clock struck ten.

"The time has come," he said.

And, as if in answer to his words, a voice in the darkness cried out:—

"The woman is here!"

A moment later Adelaide Glittering, the daughter of the haughty millionaire, was clasped in his strong arms.

"Papa is busy signing checks," said the beautiful heiress, "and will not discover my absence until he finds out that I am gone. But let us hasten."

Hurriedly they stepped into a waiting cab and were driven to the house of a clergyman.

CHAPTER II.

MAN'S DECEIT

The ceremony was about to take place. Already the groom stood with hand outstretched to receive the blushing bride. Suddenly, as if stung by a serpent, the proud beauty drew back, and cried with a look of unutterable scorn:—

"Regynold Hotfoot Clubbige you have deceived me!"

"Deceived you. How?" came the trembling question.

"You ask me how! You! who have come to marry me dressed in a sack coat and wearing a silk hat." And turning imperiously on her heel she swept from the room.

Regynold staggered a few steps after her. Then his emotion overpowered him; and, throwing his hands up in the air, he fell back into a swoon and the arms of the disappointed clergyman.

HAT'S the use of living ?
Care is on the way;
Skies so bright on Monday,
Tuesday will be gray;
We must die to-morrow,
Why not die to-day ?

What's the use of loving ?
Man with woman mates
As the world swings onward—
Thinkest thou the Fates,
With their shears and distaff,
Care who loves—or hates ?

What's the use of hating ?
Hate is only love
With the rough side outwards,
Like a cast-off glove.
Hate or shrug your shoulders
Matters it above ?

What's the use of thinking ?
Running in a ring ?
After all your logic,
Life's a piece of string.
Tangle it with thinking—
Gain you anything ?

What's the use of moaning ?
Say the world is bad—
Keep the rotten apple
When ripe can't be had.
Circumstance is crazy ?
Very well; go mad !

What's the use of dying ?
March will turn to May ;
Hell may take to-morrow
If its bright to-day;
Go and drown your sorrow—
That's the only way !

Chicago Law School

DAY AND EVENING SESSIONS

The Under-graduate Courses lead to LL.B. and admission to the Bar. Post-graduate Courses in Jurisprudence, Constitutional Law and History, International Law and Political Economy, lead to the degrees of LL.M. and D.C.L.

The System employed by the Chicago Law School is that known as the "institutional method," a plan that has received the approval of the leading legal educators of the day. It is upon this method that scientific studies generally are now pursued, and its essential features are equally well adapted to the study of law as a science. This method contemplates: First, the development of abstract legal principles as a basis; second, the illustration of the principles by reference to cases; and, third, the practical application of principles to given facts in school courts. In this way the student is educated rather than instructed, and having first acquired the theory, is afterwards inducted in the practice by the application of abstract principles to establish facts.

Caught on the Wing

HAT an advantage little Saul and his fellows possess over Gamaliel! The advantage of numbers only, yet inestimable. January and June Gamaliel sits within the same four walls, imparting instruction, unchanging, monotonous. Though his pupils are always different, they are never differentiated; he sees them, in the mass, not individually; he passes them or flunks them in bunches; he cannot distinguish them. This quarter is always the same as the last. A pleasant path enough, but he knows its every turning.

To Saul however the opening of each quarter is the discovery of a new world. In the past three months he has exhausted a subject; he has plumbed a teacher's intellect. Now he comes fresh and confident to new fields. Sitting demure and safe in his multiplicity he narrowly observes Gamaliel, who is necessarily alone and prominent. He feels, with a smile, the old familiar thrill as the hard work before him is discussed. That thrill ceased long since to influence him. He notes Gamaliel's individuality in every lecture, in every sentence, and in every mannerism, and judges his character from an inconsiderate word. On the University books Gamaliel marks him; but he, on the tablets of his memory, with far greater accuracy records Gamaliel as "passed," "passed with honor," or, it may be, "failed."

* * * *

I was writing a particularly hard thesis. I was to discuss certain economic questions that had never been settled by mortal man—and what could one woman do with them? My pencils were sharpened, the "authorities" were on a shelf before me, and notes, as numerous as ballots on election day, were all around me. But still I did not get on, and when Professor ——— came into the room I told him the difficulty.

"Wait a moment," said he, "if it's wages you're writing about, maybe I have something will help. An 'Economist' was sent me to-day, and I noticed it had an article on wages in it." A minute later he brought the "Economist." We cut the leaves, and found on page 73 a poem. This was the opening line:

"The wages of sin is death."

* * * *

I met him a day's journey from the Earth, and we traveled on together.

"I see by the sign," said I, "that you are one of the came-without-being-called. Tell me how you did it. I often wanted to, but never had courage."

"Oh, it was easy," said he, "laudanum; I had been married just nine days."

"She was not true to you, then?"

"Well, she was not the right one. She made doilies. I found them everywhere; under the dishes, and under books and bags and boxes. At last she put them under the legs of the chairs, and under my feet when I sat down. Then I came away. She read the 'Ladies' Home Journal,' too."

"Oh," said I, my heart going out to him.

After we had gone a little farther, he said: "And you, what brought you here? Married?"

"Pneumonia," I replied; "I would have been married the next month."

"Lucky man!" said he. "If it is not doilies and the 'Ladies' Home Journal,' maybe it is afternoon teas. Some women do that." And we journeyed on together.

No Trespassing

AIR PHYLLIS fenced her Maiden heart
Against all base intrusion,
For she would pass her life apart
In virginal seclusion.

She wrought her wall both stout and high
And set a warning notice nigh:
"No trespassing."

But Cupid, flitting by one day,
The fair enclosure spying,
Flew o'er the wall with laughter gay,
And found poor Phyllis sighing.
She gave him welcome and he staid;
But still the warning notice read:
"No trespassing."

I saw the rogue and ventured too.
Sweet Phyllis eyed me coldly;
But Cupid proved an ally true
And pressed my wooing boldly,
So Phyllis bade us both remain;
But set the notice up again:
"No trespassing."

Love and I

We keep our watch together,
Love and I,
In the golden dreamy weather
When June holds in fee the sky.
We watch the rainbow in the blue;
Armfuls of roses for us two;
We know our dreams will all come true,
Love and I.

We keep our watch together,
Love and I,
In October's mournful weather
When the winds go moaning by.
Our eyelids strain against the sleet,
But no inch will we retreat;
We will hold at bay defeat,
Love and I.

We keep our watch together,
Love and I,
In the dark and stormy weather,
Under winter's shuddering sky.
A mound between us heaped with snow;
Ice in our hearts, yet we'll not go;
We'll keep our watch and perish so,
Love and I.

We keep our watch together,
Love and I,
In the dreamy, dreamy weather,
Under heaven's eternal sky.
We watch the dross turn into gold;
We watch all loveliness unfold;
And each other's hands we hold,
Love and I.

LeRoy Titus Weeks.

Casual Confederates

THIN blue ice-sheet crusted the board walk. With balancing arms poising a big tiger muff at arms-length, Marilla slid along. Her progress a ripple of exclamations, little shouts, bubblings of laughter. Her body slanted forward to the drift of the motion. The man at her side walked along heavily. He wished she would even her gait. Impossible to adapt any pace to her irregular motion.

Her appreciation of his discomfort was an amusement. "You're hating me, now;" this with nose and chin buried in the muff, and a delicious demureness of the lifted eye. "Oh yes you are. I could tell you exactly the way you feel."

"Do."

"No. It wouldn't amuse me, I know, and you know. So what would be the good. Besides, they're not pretty thoughts."

His annoyance grew. An irritable jar substituted for his usual appreciative response to the little coquetties of which her manner was an aggregate.

When they reached the house they were to dine at—her brother's—his friend's—she changed to the serious. "We are playing each other's parts, to-night," she said.

"You mean—"

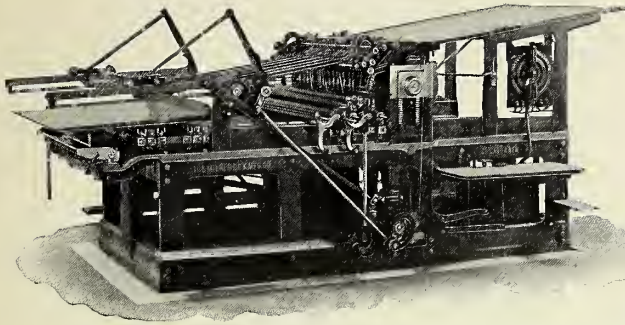

"That I am the genial good-natured one, and you the moody. Which our friends would not believe. But do point your grievance. For the life of me, I'm blind. Granted I have found you in a rather cheap subterfuge. Haven't I been charming about it? A very little modifying you see, served me. I always believed you a liar. But accept my bon-hommie. You really better had. And you know I shan't talk. Now rouse up, and don't spoil your own hand. I shall lead up to your trumps, and if you play the game, may still respect you a bit. Here—colors to fight under." And tip-toeing to reach his height, she pinned half her violets to his coat, with a little caressing touch and a flash of blue eyes up to his. Then she stepped into the door.

Every one about the campus knows him—at least by sight. He is rather good-looking, has literary and dramatic aspirations, dresses well, practices economy when with men, and is considered a good fellow generally by women. I once heard him describe himself in a newspaper office as a "free lance"; but among the social outcasts he is always spoken of as the Immaculate Deception. He is well fortified against the unpleasant jars of life by a self-possession born of conceit. I never saw him confused or embarrassed but once; that was the other afternoon on the down-town express train.

Contrary to his usual custom he rode in the smoking-car; and as he stood leaning gracefully against the ice-water tank, he looked particularly well in his new double-breasted coat and his sharply creased trousers. When the train stopped at the Hyde Park station, a drunken laboring man noisily entered the car. He walked up to the Immaculate Deception and asked for a match. Then, with all the volubility of intoxication, he plunged into a detailed account of his past life, producing from his pocket letters and money as evidence of the truth of his story. The Immaculate Deception, in his superior, aristocratic way, enjoyed the situation very much. It gave him an opportunity to make bright remarks and to ask clever questions. And the innocent replies of the drunken man, and his utter ignorance of the fact that he was being made fun of, were very amusing to the other passengers. At last, having received a match, and having lighted his stump of a pipe, the drunken man drew back a step or two and scrutinized the Immaculate Deception from head to foot. Then he said in a voice of hearty admiration, and with the evident intention of conveying a compliment:

"HOW TO GET IT" and

"ADVERTISE AND BRING BUSINESS"

"You're a good-feller; and I always like to meet a good-feller." Then, after another moment of careful scrutiny, "I bet I know what you do. You work in a hotel; I can tell by that cigar and uniform."

It was late at night, and the long street was almost deserted. The screens in the window of a saloon were lowered. It was warm and bright inside and men were drinking and playing pool quietly enough. Out in the dark, on the slippery side walk crouched the miserable figure of a man, his hat over his eyes, hands in his pockets to keep from freezing, his face close to the edge of the broad plate glass, looking in over the screen. He was already in spirit inside, enjoying the warmth and good-fellowship with "the boys," though the lack of a dime for a drink kept his wretched body out in the rain. The head-light of the cable-car flashed over his rusty hat, bent shoulders and huddled figure, and left him in the same position, motionless.

In Pursuit

Over me floatest thou
Radiantly;
Long in pursuit have I
Followed thee.

Others with earthward gaze
Treasures have gained;
Empty my hands of wealth,
Thee unattained.

Yet I shall follow thee,
This is my fate—
Nay, do not pity me,
Able to wait.

Lake Geneva Sanatorium

Is a general Sanatorium handsomely located on the shores of Lake Geneva. It is equipped in the best possible manner for Medical and Surgical treatment. It is open for all proper cases. No cases of insanity, inebriety or other objectionable cases, however, are admitted or treated. For healthfulness and beauty the location is unsurpassed. The rooms are very large, with handsome fireplaces and large windows from which one beholds the loveliest of views. The training, skill and efficiency of our nurses and masseurs, as well as the equipment for baths and hydrotherapy are not surpassed by any other institution. All physicians of the staff are in active attendance. The charges are moderate.

Air, "Benny Havens O"
Arr. by M. E. COLEMAN, '98

Oh, we came here in the autumn of eighteen ninety-three;
A half a dozen buildings had then the U. of C.
Cobb Hall was then the only place where we could daily flunk,
And in the dear old Drexel "Dorm.," was the only place to bunk.

CHORUS:

O Chicago, Chicago, how great you've grown to be,
Since first we cast our lot with thine in eighteen ninety-three.

Oh, there were more Profs. than students, but then we didn't care;
They spent their days in research work, their evenings at the Fair;
And life upon the campus was one continual swing;
We watched the Ferris wheel go 'round, and we didn't do a thing.

Oh, the commons started up that year, this was their bill of fare:
"Sauce with mold, weak coffee cold, and a hunk of grizzly bear;"
And the man who caught the most roaches, at breakfast or at tea,
Was deemed the hero of the hour, thereafter wore a C.

Oh, the girls were mostly twenty-eight, and after "Ph.D's,"
They took four hours in those old days; there were no extra fees;
And the men were mostly married, which proved a great hoodoo
To all society events: what could the poor girls do?

Oh, the Glee Club took a trip that year, they made it in a day;
The second stop was Downer's Grove, the first was Aurora;
But now we feast and dance and sing; through distance fast we're whirled,
And when the Glee Club's air ship's done, we'll tour around the world.

Jack Tatterly's Ruse

Or the Foiling of the Pirates—A Tale of Adventure on the Sea Beyond the Three-Mile Limit

"Pipe all hands to the main quarter," cried the captain of the Bounding Lass, as he stepped down from the bridge. Instantly the clear, shrill notes of the bo's'n's whistle split the quiet air, and the blue-jackets came rushing up from the fo'c's'le. When they had ranged themselves abaft the wheel, the captain addressed them :

"My men," said he, "there is a low, close-hauled brig lugging in the starboard offing. I like not her look, for unless I am mistaken she is a pirate."

A ripple of suppressed excitement ran along the line of sailors.

"At a time like this," continued the captain, "four or five heads are better than one. If we are caught not a man will live to be interviewed by newspaper correspondents. Has anyone a suggestion to offer?"

For several minutes there was a painful silence, broken only by the musical humming of the wind in the rigging, and by the rattle of the binnacle. Then, youthful, manly figure separated itself from the group of tars, and a boyish voice rang out :

"Captain, I will save the ship!"

"Shiver my timbers," said Old Tom, the bo's'n's mate, nudging the man next him, "if that ain't Jack Tatterly, the cabin-boy."

The captain looked down sharply at the mere lad of about thirteen years, who had offered to hazard so much.

"You are young," he said, frowning hoarsely.

"Yes," replied our hero modestly, "but so was Napoleon when a child."

A flattering mutter of approbation from the sailors made Jack flush slightly.

"I shall leave everything to you," said the captain after a careful survey 'of the lad. "From now until we reach port you may consider the entire crew, myself included, under your command."

Night and the pirate ship had been rapidly approaching ; and by the time that the darkness was complete scarcely a league intervened between the Bounding Lass and her pursuer. After a few hurried preparations Jack Tatterly with Old Tom, the bo's'n's mate as his only companion, manned the captain's gig and silently rowed away over the black, oily swells in the direction of the pirate vessel. Half an hour of hard work brought the low, rakish brig into sight, and under the direction of Jack, Old Tom pulled the gig under the bowsprit. It was but the work of a moment for the lad to throw a ratline over the spar and pull himself up hand over hand. Quickly

Old Tom passed a twenty-foot boom up to him ; and our hero rapidly and securely lashed it to the bowsprit. Then taking a dimly lighted ship's lantern from under his coat he carefully worked his way out to the end of the boom, and there fastened the lantern. Almost immediately the lookout on board the pirate ship sang out :

"Ship ahoy!"

"Where away?" roared the pirate captain.

"Dead ahead, sir," replied the lookout.

"Ay! ay! I make her out," cried the captain. And then he euphoniously added, referring to the commanding officer of the Bounding Lass: "The damn fool has lit a light."

Jack, laughing quietly to himself, dropped from his perilous position into the strong arms of Old Tom. Together they swiftly rowed back to the Bounding Lass. The good ship was put about, and made off on the leeward tack, cutting like a knife through the water, and throwing tons of spray against the heavens.

All night long the pirate ship pursued the ever-distant light. And it was only with the coming of gray dawn that her barbarous captain discovered the clever ruse by which Jack Tatterly had saved the lives of himself et al.

The Sorrowful Stream

In the Land of Life it floweth and floweth,
The Sorrowful Stream.

And through its waters each mortal goeth,
However he dream

He will never reach the pitiless beach
Of the Sorrowful Stream.

There are some, and the waters but lap their feet,
Of the Sorrowful Stream,

And some 'gainst whose breast the billows beat
And the foam-crests gleam.

And others there be, like wrecks of the sea,
Washed away by the Sorrowful Stream.

A Woman From Somewhere

A woman entered the parlor of a Philadelphia hotel and seated herself in a rocking chair. She was middle-aged and stout, and the chair creaked comfortably as it swung to and fro. She had been sight-seeing and was warm, and tired, and glad to rest. A man sat at a table, near by, making a memorandum in his notebook; as he put the book away, he glanced toward her, and she immediately addressed him: "Did you ever see so many people? They come from every part of the world, too. I'm from Chicago, myself; I suppose you know where that is?"

The man bowed with grave politeness. "Yes," he assented, "I know where Chicago is."

"Everyone does," said the woman, plying her palm-leaf fan with vigor, "that's the reason I always say I'm from Chicago; I get so tired of explaining. I'm really from Aurora, a town near Chicago. I don't suppose you ever heard of Aurora, though; hardly anyone has."

The man's eyes twinkled. "Oh, yes; I have been in Aurora, a thriving little city."

The woman stopped rocking and regarded her auditor with a kindling interest. "So it is," she agreed cordially, "we can get almost anything there we want; there's where we go to do our extra trading; it's our nearest large town. You see we don't live exactly in Aurora; our home is at Shabbona, a few miles from there. It's only a little town, just a station on the railroad. Of course, you never heard of it; nobody has."

"Of Shabbona?" inquired the man, smiling, "yes, I know where Shabbona is. Years ago, I saw the old chief, too, for whom the town was named. Shabbona is a pleasant village."

The woman nodded cheerily and looked, with friendly eyes, toward the man. "Just what I think every time I go there," she asserted, with approval. "We're not precisely in Shabbona, you understand; that's our postoffice, though. Our farm is just a few miles east."

Sense, and Nonsense, on Wheels

The two spun forward smoothly, side by side.

"Oh, the delicious spring morning," said the Sentimentalist, taking a deep breath.

"Yes. Warm for April, isn't it?" answered the embryo summer girl, who was still chrysalised in broadcloth and a gray fedora.

A robin piped triumph from a fence, but two south-going cyclists passed, and he flew to an elm.

"Did you notice?" cried the Sentimentalist ecstatically. "Plucky little soul to brave it out so early!"

"Yes. But I must say, shirtwaists in April seems rushing the season."

"Shirtwaists?"

"Yes. On the girl. Wasn't that what you meant?"

A dividing puddle cut off the explanation. As he again glided to his place beside her, they passed a patch of starry dandelions.

He was about to exclaim, but she interrupted:

"Have you ever eaten any of the vile salad they concoct from those little yellow things? You get it abroad, at little country places. Nasty stuff?"

He hadn't. He was in luck, she said. They rode on.

"See that slope of pines by the farm there? It reminds me of a bit of road near Ocean Beach. Do you remember?"

"Yes," she said again. "What a poky old place Ocean Beach was! Thank heavens, I have persuaded the family to go to Bar Harbor this year. I'm dying for a jolly time."

"And you'll have it there?"

"Oh dear, yes! There are no end of things one can do there, you know. I'm dreadfully busy these days, planning all my gowns. You see there's tennis, and golf, and yachting, and riding and wheeling, besides the bathing and the going out. But I do love the country!"

"So do I." He was happy that they agreed for once.

A stretch of woodland lay before them. The sunlight played across the ruddy pine-strewn path in patches. The underbrush was tipped green. Little creeping creatures ran to and fro, forgetting their winter lethargy.

She struck a root and her wheel swerved. "Oh to have all these roads asphalted!" she sighed.

"Let's sit in the shade and rest," he said.

She leaned her back against a rough pine trunk, drawing up her knees, and pressing two deliciously audacious looking little feet, booted high in brown, into the soft, elastic moss tufts.

The Sentimentalist sat opposite. He adored her this morning. She was certainly very seductive, with that fresh, crisp, youngness of hers, that matched the season. She seemed to embody it all, its subtle suggestiveness, the full promise of the young year, its wholesome spontaneity. He looked at her eyes—yes, and its enigma, its delicious mystery.

Looking up she met his gaze.

“Do you know, Mr. Allerton, what would be simply ideal now?”

“Tell me.”

“Well, if we could have two splendid big ice-cold glasses of beer. Wouldn't it taste good?”

By which he perceived that the summer girl, like nature, whom she embodied this morning, was after all at heart a gross materialist.

Writing a Verse

(Rondeau with acknowledgements to Dobson.)

To write a verse I'm asked to try.

The one who asks I can't deny;

Her pleading tones I can't refuse—

I know I'll irritate the muse;

But what does that, pray, signify?

She bids me write, and though I die

I must attempt to glorify

Erato. Pshaw! It gives the blues

To write a verse.

But then, here goes! List now a sigh;

Imagine tears bedim my eye;

I'm growing faint! What, no such ruse

Avails? Then I am sure to lose

My wits. No wonder when I try—

To write averse.

A Tale

OW gather 'round me one and all,
A story for to hear.

A wondrous tale it is; so lend
A most attentive ear;

And if it is not wise, or new, or true, at least it's queer.

'Twas in the early far-off days
When first the world begun;
The earth was in the workshop yet,
But it was nearly done.

How it was made I need not state (see Gen. I, 1).

There hung the globe, quite fresh and new,
And everything was there;
Lake Michigan and Lincoln Park,
With every single bear,
And Potter Palmer's residence, and Hooley's, and the Fair.

Dame Nature stood and eyed her work
With a complacent smile.
"It's all done but the paint," she said;
"I'll let it dry awhile,
And then I'll put the colors on and fix it up in style."

And so she got her paint-box out
All ready to begin
(The kind you buy for fifty cents,
The cover is of tin,
And there are little china plates to mix the colors in.)

Dame Nature dipped her brush, and mixed
The colors in a trice;
And oh! the pains she took to lay
Each color smooth and nice.
For desert sands she used gamboge; the trees were all green bice.

Open evenings until 10, to discuss decorations with business men

So color after color came,
All in the nicest taste.
She tipped the mountain peaks with snow;
Each curly stream she traced,
And then she made old Ocean's gray and solitary waste.

Now one paint only was unused;
It was her choicest one,
"When I have found a place for that,"
She said, "I shall be done."
('Twas all in silver paper wrapt, to keep it from the sun.)

"But what is fine enough," she thought,
"For this imperial hue?"
The lily and the rose she tried,—
The little violet too;
She tried the maiden's blushing cheek, but that would never do.

She tried it on the summer cloud,
And on the sunset sky;
The little stream was much too low,
The mountain was too high.
"The thing must be just right," said she, "that wears this royal dye."

Then lo! What is it takes her eye,
Far in the rosy west?
A banner bright that waves and leaps
Like to a warrior's crest!
Ah, that shall have the lovely hue to mark it for the best!

And to this day, at misty morn,
Or in the golden noon,
Or mellowed with the sunset glow,
Or 'neath the quiet moon,—
The banner waves; and to this day its color is—maroon!

The Depths of Depravity

"Gad! that's a stunning bit," said I. Loie had pinned up the new poster, and against the peacock coloring on the wall the ambers and golds were warm and deep.

Loie settled herself contentedly in the big chair. "She's awfully depraved," she exclaimed delightedly.

"Yet fascinating," said I.

"That's the attraction," she asserted.

"Oh, not the depravity," said I, but her experience of life, that perfect assurance."

"You can have that without necessarily getting such a mouth," she said.

"Don't let's point it to the mouth," I besought.

We went to the eyes, the lift of them, the enervated forward droop of the shoulders.

"Yes," Loie repeated, "you can have no end of experience without anyone, anyone, ever reading it in your face."

I looked at her. Her features were sharply chiseled and her coloring strangely exquisite.

She laughed. "I'll tell you a story," she said.

Her color deepened, and for the time of the telling the gloom of her eyes was gone.

I suppose there was nothing unusual in the story, but I am conventional and it seemed appalling. She laughed again when she had finished. But it ended in a sob and I took her little head in my arms to comfort her.

Then I wondered, was it true or was the little girl enjoying to the full the effect of a dramatic impulse?

Serenade

Soft stars shining,
Clouds reclining
On the lining
Of the blue.
Roses feeling
O'er them stealing,
Softly o'er them,
Mists of dew.

My love lies sleeping;
O'er her creeping,
In God's keeping,
Dream-wings light.
O, starlight beaming,
Through lattice streaming,
Enwrap her, dreaming,
Through the night.

The Instructor in Chapel

HE president wrote the instructor a little note, asking him, quite unofficially, if he would not attend chapel now and then, in order to let the students see the enthusiasm for religious instruction that prevailed throughout the faculty. The instructor, amiable though slightly blasé, decided, half cynically, to consent. He remembered the chapel services at his own college, dignified, as even the Freshmen were; intellectual, as comported with the reputation of an institution whose half-backs wore eye-glasses. Therefore, the instructor, with a slight warmth in his heart, put on his cap and gown and went as he was asked. His unfamiliarity with the routine placed him in some doubt as to what to do with his cap. He attempted also to sit down at the wrong time, but his knees sprung straight again as he saw his colleagues still standing. There was a poor song, a short reading, a shorter prayer. Then the scholarly president jerked out a few notices, which met with more attention than the prayer. It was over. The instructor, in the black gowned row, filed out, feeling vaguely as one who had found bread-crumbs in the holy of holies.

She was a dear old soul, and she used to try to convert me. She approved of all that I did, but I believe she thought I held heathenish and pagan notions on religion, and it troubled her. Usually I evaded her when this subject came up, but sometimes she was gently persistent, and then she would look grieved at my answers. One day we talked about the future world. My tongue ran away with me, and I explained at some length my conception of heaven and hell, as states of consciousness, forgetting that such an idea would be offensive to the little woman who listened. When I was done, she said:

"And you don't believe in a hell?"

"No."

"Pray for light, my dear. Pray for light."

MYRON took down a photograph from the mantle. He held it with a gentle, loving admiration.

"She was an artist," he said, "a great artist."

"She had glorious hair," I ventured, looking over his shoulder.

"She had imagination"—

"And what a throat!"—

"She had a soul—a point of view—a conception of life."

"But who was she; what did she do?" I asked.

"Her life was her art," he answered. "A series of dramatic impulses. Of perfect poses. She had a genius for lying; a master mind. And the audacity of her truths was most illuminating."

"Where did you meet her, Myron? She looks foreign."

He studied the photograph for a while, lost in thought. Then: "I knew her in Venice, long ago. She was a little Russian girl. Her name was Marusha Anàtoff."

Rondeaux to Order

HEN she had passed—oh, happiness divine,
 Rarer and sweeter than the Chian wine
 God Bacchus brewed Apollo, long ago—
 (The figure's flat, stale, profitless, I know,
 Used since the Muses first hung out their sign:

“Rhymes furnished to young poets—prices low
 And figures gratis. Yours to serve, The Nine.”)—
 But here I must return to my first line:—
 When she had passed,

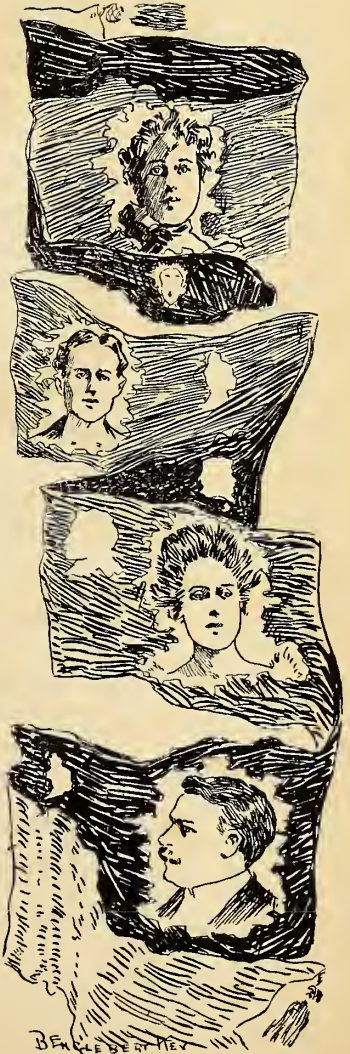

My dull eyes sparkled to a livelier shine.
 My cold heart warmed again; and I, in fine
 Woke to new life all suddenly, as though
 Electrically shocked, forgot my woe
 And in that instant knew the pot was mine,
 When she had passed.

Woman and Wine

Woman, and Wine! I wonder who
 First sung the glories of the two?
 Who bound them in the immortal phrase.
 And whether both he meant to praise
 And which the more—I wish I knew.

Without them, what would poor man do?
 Work dully through the dreary days,
 Walk dumbly down the dusty ways—
 Woman, and Wine!

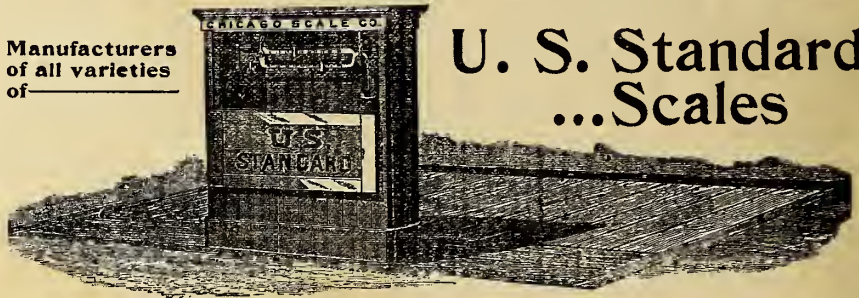

What if the headaches would be few?
 And what if wine its thousands slew,
 And woman her ten thousands slays?
 In equal honor, equal praise.
 Still, still I hold, till life be through,
 Woman, and Wine!

The Seasons

Oh, tell me a tale of the Kelly girl,
 In the days of the driven snow,
 Of classes and theses and musty tomes,
 Of the study of people who have no homes—
 "To train the brain," you know.
 With a ho, ho, ho, for the midnight oil,
 And the daughter of horrid, wasting toil,
 And here's to her massive brow!

Then troll me a stave of the Kelly girl
 In the days of the Summertime,
 Of "cuts" and strolls and drives and balls,
 Of pink shirt-waists and parasols,
 All strung to a lover's rhyme.
 With a ho, ho, ho, for frivolity,
 And the daughter of rollicking jollity,
 And here's to her flashing eyes!

A Hero

The curtains were closely drawn over the windows so that the room would have been dark as night but for the dim light from a shaded candle. Stretched on the bed lay a young man. His face and brow flamed with fever, and his eyes stared wildly out of their hollow sockets. Muttering in delirium he tossed restlessly to and fro, seeming to expend in useless energy the little strength left to him. The clean, pungent odor of disinfectants, the grave—almost clerical—physician, and the array of bottles on the little table near the head of the bed, all gave evidence of the critical condition of the patient.

At last the invalid grew calmer; the clear light of sanity came back into his eyes, and he seemed to comprehend the seriousness of his condition. Weakly raising himself on his elbow he glanced around the room.

"Mother!" he spoke in a strained, almost inaudible whisper. "Mother!"

A gentle, tired-eyed woman rose from her seat beside the bed and bent over the sufferer.

"Mother, if I should die to-night promise me—promise me that you will send a withdrawal card to the Dean."

Then he sank back on the pillows, and fell into a placid sleep.

He had done his duty.

A Plea from the Management

Our story, by no means, we think to end,
Till we tell you with what we have had to contend.
We have been slaving by night and by day,
With the object in view of making this pay.

'Gainst obstacles greatest we've had to buck;
We've met mith some of the worst kind of luck.
Much you have done with your plunk and a half,
But we've had to raise a small golden calf.

"What, another one still!" the business man cried,
When to advertise here, to induce him we tried.
Then we found in dismay, some eight magazines,
Which the 'Varsity Press fills with ads. and with dreams.

On account of all this, we're out, like the book,
As plainly is shown by the way accounts look.
One favor we ask to make next year's work light,
So the management then will be spared such a fight.

The Plea

Give to our ads. your careful attention;
To our advertisers the most of your trade.
When going to them the "Cap and Gown" mention;
They've turned out the book; they deserve to be paid.

The Cap and Gown
for 1898 has been compiled and edited at the Maison des Vagabonds in the University of Chicago, and has been done into type and bound by Messrs.
Marsh & Grant at their print-shop in Dearborn street, Chicago, Illinois
